The Dutch had for ſome time carried on a very conſiderable traffick, not only in taking the fair advantages of the neutrality, but alſo in ſupplying the French with naval ſtores, and tranſporting the produce of the French ſugar colonies to Europe, as carriers hired by the proprietors. The Engliſh government, incenſed at this unfair commerce, proſecuted with ſuch flagrant partiality for their enemies, iſſued orders for the cruizers to arreſt all ſhips of neutral powers that ſhould have French property on board; in conſequence of which orders, ſeveral Dutch ſhips were taken, and condemned as legal prizes, both in England and Jamaica.

The ſubjects of the United Provinces raiſed a loud clamour againſt the Engliſh for having thus, as they ſaid, violated the laws of nations, and the particular treaty of commerce ſubſiſting between Great Britain and the republic. Remonſtrances were made to the Engliſh miniſtry, who expoſtulated in their turn with the deputies of the States-general; and the two nations were inflamed againſt each other with the moſt bitter animoſity.

The Britiſh reſident at the Hague, in a conference with the States, repreſented that the king his maſter could not hope to ſee peace ſpeedily reſtored, if neutral princes ſhould aſſume a right of carrying on the trade of his enemies: that he expected, from their known juſtice, and the alliance by which they were ſo nearly connected with his ſubjects, they would honeſtly abandon this fraudulent commerce, and agree that naval ſtores ſhould be comprehended in the claſs of contraband commodities. He anſwered ſome articles of the complaints they had made with great candour and moderation; declared his majeſty's abhorrence of the violences which had been committed upon the ſubjects of the United Provinces; explained the ſteps which had been taken by the Engliſh government to bring the offenders to juſtice, as well as to prevent ſuch outrages for the future; and aſſured them, that his Britannic majeſty had nothing more at heart than to renew, and maintain in full force, the mutual confidence and friendſhip by which the maritime powers of England and Holland had been ſo long united.

Theſe profeſſions of eſteem and affection were not ſufficient to allay the apprehenſions of the Dutch merchants; and the French party, which was both numerous and powerful, employed all their artifice and addreſs in exaſperating their paſſions, and widening the breach between the two nations. The court of Verſailles did not fail to lay hold of ſuch a favourable opportunity: while, on one hand, their miniſters and emiſſaries in Holland exaggerated the indignities and injuries which the States had ſuffered from the proceedings of the Engliſh; they, on the other hand, flattered and cajoled them with little advantages in trade, and formal profeſſions of friendſhip.

The ſpirit of the Dutch merchants at this juncture, and their ſentiments with reſpect to England, may be learned from a memorial to the States General, ſubſcribed by two hundred and ſixty-nine traders, compoſed and preſented with equal ſecrecy and circumſpection. In this famous remonſtrance they complained, that the violences and unjuſt depredations, committed by the Engliſh ſhips of war and privateers on the veſſels and effects of them and their fellow-ſubjects, were not only continued, but daily multiplied; and cruelty and exceſſes carried to ſuch a height, that the petitioners were forced to implore the aſſiſtance of their High Mightineſſes tineſſes to protect, in the moſt efficacious manner, their commerce and navigation, which were the two ſinews of the republic. For this neceſſary purpoſe they offered to contribute each his contingent, and to arm at their own charge; and other propoſitions were made for an immediate augmentation of their marine.

While this party induſtriouſly laboured to effect a rupture with England, the princeſs Governante employed all her intereſt and addreſs to divert them from this object, by alarming them with juſt apprehenſions of the power of France, and exhorting them to augment their forces, ſo as to prepare againſt all attempts from that quarter. At the ſame time ſhe ſpared no pains to compromiſe the differences between her huſband's country and her father's kingdom; and, without doubt, her healing counſels were of great efficacy in preventing matters from coming to a very dangerous extremity.

The operations of Great Britain during this campaign were not confined to Europe: the continent of America and the coaſt of Africa both felt the weight of her arms. The whole gum trade from Cape Blanco to the river Gambia, an extent of five hundred miles, had been engroſſed by the French, who built Fort Louis within the mouth of the Senegal, extending their factories near three leagues up that river, and on the ſame coaſt had fortified the iſland of Goree, in which they maintained a conſiderable garriſon. The gum-ſenega, of which a great quantity is uſed by the manufacturers of England, being wholly in the hands of the enemy, the Engliſh dealers were obliged to buy it at ſecond hand from the Dutch, who purchaſed it of the French, and exacted an exorbitant price for that commodity. This conſideration forwarded the plan for annexing that country to the poſſeſſions of Great Britain.

The project was firſt conceived by Mr. Thomas Cumming, a ſenſible quaker, who, as a private merchant, had made a voyage to Portenderrick, an adjoining part of the coaſt, and contracted a perſonal acquaintance with Amir, the Mooriſh king of Legibelli *. He found this African prince extremely well diſpoſed towards the ſubjects of Great Britain, whom he publicly preferred to all other Europeans; and ſo enraged againſt the French, that he declared he ſhould never be eaſy till they were extirpated from the river Senegal. At that very time he had denounced war againſt them, and earneſtly deſired that the king of England would ſend out an armament to reduce Fort Louis and Goree, with ſome ſhips of force to protect the traders. In that caſe he promiſed to join his Britannic majeſty's forces, and indulge his ſubjects with an excluſive commerce.

Mr. Cumming not only perceived the advantage that would accrue from ſuch an extluſive privilege with regard to the gum, but foreſaw many other important conſequences of an extenſive trade in a country which, over and above the gum-ſenega, abounds in many valuable articles, ſuch as gold duſt, elephants teeth, hides, cotton, bees-wax, ſlaves, oſtrich feathers, indigo, ambergris, and civet. Pleaſed with the proſpect of an acquiſition ſo valuable to his country, this honeſt quaker was equally minute and indefatigable in his enquiries, with regard to the commerce of the coaſt, as well as the ſtrength and ſituation of the French ſettlements on the river Senegal; and at his return to England actually projected the plan of an expedition for the conqueſt of Fort Louis.

This was preſented to the Board of Trade, by whom it was approved, after a ſevere ſcrutiny: but it required the patriotic zeal, and invincible perſeverance of Mr. Cumming, to ſurmount a variety of obſtacles before it was adopted by the miniſtry; and even then it was not executed in its full extent. He was abridged of one large ſhip; and in lieu of ſix hundred land-forces to be draughted from different regiments, which he in vain demanded, no more than two hundred marines were allotted for this ſervice.

After repeated ſolicitation, he at laſt, in the year 1757, obtained an order that the two annual ſhips bound to the coaſt of Guinea ſhould be joined by a ſloop and two buſſes, and make an attempt upon the French ſettlements in the river Senegal. Theſe ſhips, however, were detained by contrary winds, until the ſeaſon was too far advanced for undertaking the expedition, which was therefore poſtponed. In the beginning of the preſent year Mr. Cumming, being ſupported by the intereſt of a conſiderable merchant in the city, to whom he had imparted the plan, renewed his application to the miniſtry, and they determined to hazard the enterprize.

A ſmall ſquadron was equipped for this expedition, under the command of captain Marſh, having on board a body of marines commanded by major Maſon, with a detachment of artillery, ten pieces of cannon, eight mortars, and a conſiderable quantity of warlike ſtores and ammunition. Captain Walker was appointed engineer; and Mr. Cumming was concerned as a principal director and promoter of the expedition. This little armament ſailed in the beginning of March; and in their paſſage touched at the iſland of Teneriffe, where, while the ſhips ſupplied themſelves with wine and water, Mr. Cumming proceeded in the Swan ſloop to Portenderrick, being charged with a letter of credence to his old friend the king of that country, who had favoured him in his laſt viſit with an excluſive trade on that coaſt, by a formal charter, written in the Arabic language; which charter is ſtill in his poſſeſſion.

This prince was now up the country, engaged in a war with his neighbours, called the Diable Moors †; and the queen-dowager, who remained at Portenderrick, acquainted Mr. Cumming, that ſhe could not at preſent ſpare any troops to join the Engliſh in their expedition againſt Senegal; but ſhe aſſured him that, ſhould the French be

* The name the natives give to that part of South Barbary, known to merchants and navigators by that of The Gum Coaſt, and called in maps, The Sandy Deſart of Sara, and ſometimes Zara.

† This is the name by which the ſubjects of Legibelli diſtinguiſh thoſe of Brackna, who inhabit the country farther up the river Senegal, and were in conſtant alliance with the French.

extirpated, ſhe and her ſubjects would go thither and ſettle. In the mean time, one of the chiefs, called prince Amir, diſpatched a meſſenger to the king with advice of their arrival and deſign. He declared that he would, with all poſſible diligence, aſſemble three hundred warriors to join the Engliſh troops; and that, in his opinion, the king would reinforce them with a detachment from his army.

By this time captain Marſh, with the reſt of the armament, had arrived at Portenderrick, and apprehending that the enemy might receive intimation of his deſign, reſolved to proceed on the expedition without waiting for the promiſed auxiliaries. On the twenty-ſecond of April he weighed anchor, and next day at four o'clock diſcovered the French flag flying upon Fort Louis, ſituated in the midſt of a pretty conſiderable town, which exhibited a very agreeable appearance. The commodore having made prize of a Dutch ſhip richly laden with gum, which lay without the bar, came to anchor in Senegal road, at the mouth of the river; and here he obſerved ſeveral armed ſloops which the enemy had poſted to defend the paſſage of the bar, which is extremely dangerous. All the boats were employed in conveying the ſtores into the ſmall craft, while three of the ſloops continued exchanging ſhot over a narrow tongue of land with the veſſels of the enemy, conſiſting of one brig and ſix armed ſloops, mounted with great guns and ſwivels.

At length the channel being diſcovered, and the wind, which generally blows down the river, veering about, captain Millar, of the London buſs, ſeized that opportunity; and paſſing the bar with a full ſail, caſt anchor on the inſide, where he lay, till night, expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy. Next day he was joined by the other ſmall veſſels, and a regular engagement enſued. This was warmly maintained on both ſides, until the buſſes and one dogger running aground, immediately bulged, and were filled with water. Then the troops they contained took to their boats, and with ſome difficulty reached the ſhore, where they drew up in a body, and were ſoon joined by their companions from the other veſſels; ſo that now the whole amounted to three hundred and ninety marines, excluſive of the detachment of artillery.

As they laid their account with being attacked by the natives, who appeared on the ſhore at ſome diſtance, ſeemingly determined to oppoſe the deſcent, they immediately formed an intrenchment, and began to diſembark the ſtores, great part of which lay under water. While they were employed in raiſing this occaſional defence, the negroes came in great numbers and ſubmitted; and on the ſucceeding day they were joined by three hundred ſeamen, who paſſed the bar in ſloops, with their enſigns and colours flying.

They were proceeding in their operations with great ſpirit and activity, when two French deputies arrived at the intrenchment, with propoſals for a capitulation from the governor of Fort Louis. After ſome heſitation, captain Marſh and major Maſon agreed, that all the white people belonging to the French company at Senegal ſhould be ſafely conducted to France in an Engliſh veſſel, without being deprived of their private effects, provided all the merchandize and uncoined treaſure ſhould be delivered up to the victors; and that all the forts, ſtore-houſes, veſſels, arms, proviſions, and every article belonging to the company in that river, ſhould be put into the hands of the Engliſh immediately after the capitulation ſhould be ſigned: that the free natives living at Fort Louis ſhould remain in quiet poſſeſſion of their effects, and in the free exerciſe of their religion; and that all negroes, mulattoes, and others, who could prove themſelves free, ſhould have it in their option either to remain in the place, or remove to any other part of the country.

The captains Campbell and Walker were immediately ſent up the river with a flag of truce, to ſee the articles ſigned and executed; but the current of the ſtream was ſo ſtrong, that they did not arrive at the fort till three in the morning. As ſoon as the day broke they hoiſted their flag, and rowed up towards a battery on the point of the iſland, where they lay upon their oars very near a full hour, beating the chamade; but no notice was taken of their arrival. Suſpecting the cauſe of this ſtrange conduct, they retired down the river to their intrenchment, where they learned that the negroes on the iſland had riſen in arms, and blocked up the French in Fort Louis, reſolving to defend the place to the laſt extremity, unleſs they ſhould be included in the capitulation. This circumſtance was ſignified in a ſecond letter from the governor, who likewiſe acquainted the Engliſh commander, that unleſs the French director-general ſhould be allowed to remain with the natives, as a ſurety for the performance of that article of the capitulation in which they were comprehended, they would ſuffer themſelves to be cut in pieces rather than ſubmit.

This requeſt being granted, the Engliſh forces began their march to Fort Louis, attended by a number of long-boats, in which the artillery and ſtores had been embarked. The French ſeeing them, immediately ſtruck their colours; and major Maſon took poſſeſſion of the caſtle, where he found ninety-two pieces of cannon, with treaſure and merchandize to a conſiderable value. The corporation and burghers of the town of Senegal ſubmitted, and ſwore allegiance to his Britannic majeſty: the neighbouring princes, accompanied by numerous retinues, viſited the commander, and concluded treaties with the Engliſh nation; and the king of Portenderrick, or Legibelli, ſent an ambaſſador from his camp to major Maſon, with compliments of congratulation, and aſſurances of friendſhip.

The number of free independent negroes and mulattoes ſettled at Senegal amounted to three thouſand, and many of theſe enjoyed ſlaves and poſſeſſions of their own. The two French factories of Podore and Galam, the latter ſituated nine hundred miles farther up the river, were included in the capitulation; ſo that Great Britain, almoſt without ſtriking a blow, found herſelf in poſſeſſion of a ſettlement, from which, with proper care, very conſiderable advantages may be derived.

This ſignal acquiſition was, in a great meaſure, owing to the ſagacity, zeal, and indefatigable efforts of Mr. Cumming, who firſt projected the plan, afterwards ſolicited the armament, and finally ſuperintended the execution of it in perſon; a ſervice which muſt ever recommend him to the love and eſteem of his fellow-ſubjects, and ought certainly tainly to procure him a handſome gratuity from his country.

Fort Louis being furniſhed with an Engliſh garriſon, and ſome armed veſſels left to guard the paſſage of the bar, at the mouth of the river, the great ſhips ſet ſail on an expedition, to the iſland of Goree, which lies at the diſtance of thirty leagues from Senegal. There the French company had conſiderable magazines and warehouſes, and lodged the negro-ſlaves until they could be ſhipped for the Weſt-Indies. If the additional force which Mr. Cumming propoſed for the conqueſt of this iſland had been added to the armament, in all probability, the iſland would have been reduced; and, in that caſe, the nation would have ſaved a conſiderable expence of a ſubſequent expedition againſt it, under the conduct of commodore Keppel. At preſent the ſhips, by which Goree was attacked, were found unequal to the attempt, and it miſcarried accordingly; though the miſcarriage was attended with little or no damage to the aſſailants.

However important the conqueſt of Senegal, it was of little conſequence in compariſon of the ſcenes which were acted in America, where, excluſive of the fleet and marines, the government had aſſembled about fifty thouſand men, including two and twenty thouſand regular troops. The earl of Loudon having returned to England, the chief command in America devolved to major-general Abercrombie; but as the objects of operation were various, the forces were divided into three ſeparate bodies, under as many different commanders. About twelve thouſand were deſtined to undertake the ſiege of Louiſbourg, on the iſland of Cape Breton. The general himſelf reſerved near ſixteen thouſand for the reduction of Crown Point, a fort ſituated on the lake Champlain; eight thouſand, under the conduct of brigadier-general Forbes, were allotted for the conqueſt of Fort du Queſne, which ſtood a great way to the ſouthward, near the river Ohio; and a conſiderable garriſon was left at Annapolis in Nova Scotia.

The reduction of Louiſbourg and the iſland of Cape Breton, being an object of immediate conſideration, was undertaken with all poſſible diſpatch. Major-general Amherſt being joined by admiral Boſcawen, with the fleet and forces from England, the whole armament, conſiſting of one hundred and fifty-ſeven ſail, took their departure from the harbour of Halifax, in Nova Scotia, on the twenty-eighth of May; and on the ſecond day of June part of the tranſports arrived in the bay of Gabarus, about ſeven miles to the weſtward of Louiſburgh. The garriſon of this place, commanded by the chevalier Drucour, conſiſted of two thouſand five hundred regular troops, three hundred militia, formed of the burghers, and towards the end of the ſiege they were joined by three hundred and fifty Canadians, including threeſcore Indians.

The harbour was defended by ſix ſhips of the line; the Prudent and Entreprenant, of ſeventy-four guns each; the Capricieux, Celebre, and Bienfaiſant, of ſixty-four; and the Apollo, of fifty. Beſides theſe, there were five frigates, the Chevre, Biche, Fidelle, Diana, and Eccho, three of which the enemy had ſunk acroſs the harbour's mouth, in order to render it inacceſſible to the Engliſh ſhipping. The fortifications were in bad repair, many parts of them crumbling down the covered way; ſeveral baſtions expoſed in ſuch a manner as to be enfiladed by the beſiegers, and no part of the town ſecure from the effects of cannonading and bombardment. The governor had taken all the precautions in his power to prevent a debarkation, by eſtabliſhing a chain of poſts, that extended two leagues and a half along the moſt acceſſible parts of the beach: intrenchments were thrown up, and batteries erected; but there were ſome intermediate places which could not be properly ſecured, and in one of theſe the Engliſh effected a landing.

The diſpoſition being made for this purpoſe, a detachment, in ſeveral ſloops, under convoy, paſſed by the mouth of the harbour towards Lorembec, in order to draw the enemy's attention that way, while the landing ſhould be really attempted on the other ſide of the town. On the eighth day of June, the troops being diſtributed in the boats before daybreak, in three diviſions, ſeveral ſloops and frigates, that were ſtationed along ſhore in the bay of Gabarus, began to ſcour the beach with their ſhot; and after the fire had continued about a quarter of an hour, the boats, containing the diviſion on the left, were rowed towards the ſhore, under the command of brigadier-general Wolfe, an accompliſhed officer, who afterwards exhibited very extraordinary proofs of military genius.

At the ſame time the other two diviſions, on the right and in the centre, commanded by the brigadiers Whitmore and Laurence, made a ſhew of landing, in order to divide and diſtract the enemy. Notwithſtanding an impetuous ſurf, by which many boats were overſet, and a very ſevere fire of cannon and muſketry from the enemy's batteries, which did conſiderable execution, brigadier Wolfe purſued his point with equal courage and deliberation. The ſoldiers leaped into the water with the moſt eager alacrity, and gaining the ſhore, attacked the enemy in ſuch a furious manner, that in a few minutes they drove them from their works and batteries, and obliged them to fly with the utmoſt precipitation. The other diviſions landed alſo; but not without an obſtinate oppoſition: and the ſtores, with the artillery, being brought on ſhore, the town of Louiſbourg was formally inveſted.

The difficulty of landing ſtores and implements in boiſterous weather, and the nature of the ground, which, being marſhy, was unfit for the conveyance of heavy cannon, interrupted the operations of the ſiege; and Mr. Amherſt made his approaches with great circumſpection, ſecuring his camp with redoubts and epaulements from any attacks of the Canadians, of which he apprehended there was a conſiderable body behind him on the iſland, as well as from the fire of the French ſhipping in the harbour, which would otherwiſe have galled him extremely in his advances.

The governor of Louiſbourg having demoliſhed the grand battery, which was detached from the body of the place, and withdrawn his out-poſts, prepared for making a vigorous defence. A very ſevere fire, well directed, was maintained againſt the beſiegers, and their works, from the town, the iſland battery, and the ſhips in the harbour, and divers ſallies were made, though without much effect. In the mean time brigadier Wolfe, with a ſtrong detachment, had marched round the north-eaſt part of the harbour, and taken poſſeſſion of the the Lighthouſe-point, where he erected ſeveral batteries againſt the ſhips and the iſland fortification, which laſt was ſoon ſilenced.

On the nineteenth day of June the Eccho, a French frigate, was taken by the Engliſh cruiſers, after having eſcaped from the harbour. From the officers on board this ſhip the admiral learned that the Bizarre, another frigate, had ſailed from thence on the day of the diſembarkation; and the Comete had likewiſe followed her example. Beſides the regular approaches to the town, conducted by the engineers under the immediate command and inſpection of general Amherſt, divers batteries were raiſed by the detached corps under brigadier Wolfe, who exerted himſelf with ſurpriſing activity, and grievouſly annoyed the enemy, both in the town and the ſhipping.

On the twenty-firſt day of July the three great ſhips, the Entreprenant, Capricieux, and Celebre, were ſet on fire by the bomb-ſhells, and reduced to aſhes; ſo that none remained but the Prudent and Bienfaiſant, which the admiral undertook to deſtroy. For this purpoſe, in the night between the twenty-fifth and twenty ſixth days of the month, the boats of the ſquadron were in two diviſions detached into the harbour, under the command of two young captains, Laforey and Balſour. They accordingly penetrated, in the dark, through a terrible fire of cannon and muſquetry, and boarded the enemy ſword in hand. The Prudent, being aground, was ſet on fire, and deſtroyed; but the Bienfaiſant was towed out of the harbour in triumph.

In the proſecution of the ſiege the admiral and general aſſiſted each other with remarkable harmony; the former chearfully furniſhing the latter with cannon, and other implements, with detachments of marines to ſecure the poſts on ſhore, and with parties of ſeamen to act as pioneers, and concur in working the guns and mortars. The fire of the town was managed with equal ſpirit and dexterity, and kept up with great perſeverance; until, at length, their ſhipping being all taken and deſtroyed, the caſerns ruined in the two principal baſtions, forty out of fifty-two pieces of cannon diſmounted, broke, or rendered unſerviceable, and ſeveral practicable breaches effected, the governor, in a letter to Mr. Amherſt, propoſed a capitulation, on the ſame terms that were granted to the Engliſh at Portmahon.

In anſwer to this propoſal he was told, that he and his garriſon muſt ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war, otherwiſe he might next morning expect a general aſſault by the ſhipping under admiral Boſcawen. The chevalier Drucour, piqued at the ſeverity of theſe conditions, replied, that, rather than comply with them, he would ſtand an aſſault; but the commiſſary-general, and intendant of the colony, preſented a petition from the traders and inhabitants of the place, in conſequence of which he ſubmitted. On the twenty-ſeventh day of July three companies of grenadiers, commanded by major Farquhar, took poſſeſſion of the weſtern gate; and brigadier Whitmore was ſent into the town, to ſee the garriſon lay down their arms and deliver up their colours on the eſplanade, and to poſt the neceſſary guards on the ſtores, magazines, and ramparts.

Thus, with the inconſiderable loſs of about four hundred men killed or wounded, the Engliſh obtained poſſeſſion of the important iſland of Cape Breton, and the ſtrong town of Louiſbourg, in which the victors found two hundred and twenty-one pieces of cannon, with eighteen mortars, and a large quantity of ſtores and ammunition. The merchants and inhabitants were conveyed to France in Engliſh bottoms; but the garriſon, together with the ſea-officers, marines, and mariners, amounting in all to five thouſand ſix hundred and thirty-ſeven priſoners, were tranſported to England.

The loſs of Louiſbourg gave a fatal blow to the French intereſt in America, and facilitated the reduction of their other ſettlements in that part of the world. An account of the affair was immediately brought to England, in a veſſel diſpatched for that purpoſe, with captain Amherſt, brother to the commander; who was alſo intruſted with eleven pair of colours taken at the ſiege. Theſe were, by his majeſty's order, carried in great parade, eſcorted by detachments of horſe and foot guards, with kettle-drums and trumpets, from the palace of Kenſington to St. Paul's cathedral, where they were depoſited as trophies of victory, under a diſcharge of cannon, and other ſuitable expreſſions of triumph and exultation. Nor were the rejoicings for this conqueſt confined to London: addreſſes of congratulation were preſented to his majeſty by almoſt every town and corporation in the kingdom.

After the reduction of Cape Breton, ſome ſhips were detached with a body of troops, under the command of lieutenant-colonel lord Rollo, to take poſſeſſion of the iſland of St. John, which alſo lies in the gulph of St. Laurence, and, by its fertility in corn and cattle, had, ſince the beginning of the war, ſupplied Quebec with conſiderable quantities of proviſion. It was likewiſe the aſylum to which the French neutrals of Annapolis fled for ſhelter, from the Engliſh government; and the retreat from whence they and the Indians uſed to make their ſudden incurſions into Nova Scotia, where they committed the moſt inhuman barbarities on the defenceleſs ſubjects of Great Britain.

The number of inhabitants amounted to four thouſand one hundred, who ſubmitted, and brought in their arms: then lord Rollo took poſſeſſion of the governor's quarters, where he found ſeveral ſcalps of Engliſhmen, whom the ſavages had butchered in conſequence of the encouragement they received from their French patrons and allies, who gratified them with a certain ſum for every ſcalp they produced. The iſland was ſtocked with above ten thouſand head of black cattle, and ſome of the farmers raiſed each twelve hundred buſhels of corn annually for the market of Quebec.

The joy and ſatisfaction ariſing from the conqueſt of Louiſbourg and St. John was not a little damped by the diſaſter which happened to the main body of the Britiſh forces in America, under the immediate direction of general Abercrombie, who, as we have already remarked, had propoſed the reduction of the French forts on the lakes George and Champlain, as the chief objects of his operation, with a view to protect the frontier of the Britiſh colonies, and open a paſſage for the future conqueſt of Canada.

In

In the beginning of July his forces, amounting to near ſeven thouſand regular troops, and ten thouſand provincials, embarked on the Lake George, in the neighbourhood of Lake Champlain, on board of nine hundred batteaus, and one hundred and thirty-five whale boats with proviſion, artillery, and ammunition; ſeveral pieces of cannon being mounted on rafts to cover the purpoſed landing, which was next day effected without oppoſition. The general's deſign was to attack Ticonderoga, a fort ſituated on a tongue of land extending between Lake George and a narrow gut that communicates with the Lake Champlain. This fortification was, on three ſides, encompaſſed with water, and in front nature had ſecured it with a moraſs.

The Engliſh troops being landed, were immediately marſhalled in three columns, and began their march to the enemy's advanced guard, conſiſting of one battalion, encamped behind a breaſtwork of logs, which they now abandoned with precipitation, after having ſet it on fire, and burned their tents and implements. The Britiſh forces proſecuted their march in the ſame order; but the route lying through a thick wood that did not admit of any regular progreſſion or paſſage, and the guides proving extremely ignorant, the troops were bewildered, and the columns broken by falling in one upon another.

Lord Howe being advanced at the head of the right center column, encountered a French detachment, who had likewiſe loſt their way in their retreat from the advanced guard, and a warm ſkirmiſh enſued. The diſpute was maintained for ſome time with great obſtinacy on both ſides; nor did the enemy give way until they had loſt about three hundred killed, and one hundred and forty-eight taken priſoners, including five officers. This petty advantage, however, was dearly purchaſed with the loſs of lord Howe, who fell in the beginning of the action, univerſally lamented, as a young nobleman of the moſt promiſing talents, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a peculiar manner by his courage, activity, and rigid obſervation of military diſcipline, and had gained the eſteem and affection of the ſoldiery by his generoſity, humanity, and engaging addreſs.

The general finding the troops greatly exhauſted, from want of proper reſt and refreſhment, thought it moſt adviſable to march back to the landing-place, where they accordingly arrived about eight in the morning. Then he detached lieutenant-colonel Bradſtreet with one regular regiment, ſix companies of Royal Americans, the batteau men, and a body of rangers, to take poſſeſſion of a ſaw-mill in the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga, which the enemy had deſerted.

This poſt being ſecured, the general advanced again towards Ticonderoga, where he learned from the priſoners the enemy had collected eight battalions, with a body of Canadians and Indians, amounting in all to ſix thouſand. Theſe, they ſaid, being encamped before the fort, were employed in forming a ſtrong intrenchment, where they intended to wait for a reinforcement of three thouſand men, which had been detached under the command of M. de Levi, to make a diverſion on the ſide of the Mohawk river; but upon the news of Mr. Abercrombie's approach, were now recalled for the defence of Ticonderoga.

This information determined the Engliſh general to ſtrike, if poſſible, ſome deciſive ſtroke before the junction could be effected. He therefore early next morning detached his engineer acroſs the river on the oppoſite ſide of the fort, to take a view of the enemy's intrenchments; and this officer reported, that the works being ſtill unfiniſhed, might be attempted with a good proſpect of ſucceſs. A diſpoſition was made accordingly for the attack; and after proper guards had been left at the ſaw-mill and the landing-place, the whole army was put in motion.

They advanced with great intrepidity towards the intrenchments, which, however, they found impregnable. The breaſtworſt was no leſs than eight feet high, and the ground before it covered with felled trees, with their boughs pointing outwards, projecting in ſuch a manner as to render the intrenchment almoſt inacceſſible. Notwithſtanding theſe ſeemingly inſuperable difficulties, the Britiſh troops marched up to the aſſault with an undaunted reſolution, and ſuſtained a terrible fire from the enemy's muſquetry and cannon. They endeavoured to cut their way, ſword in hand, through theſe embaraſſments; and ſome of them even mounted the parapet; but the enemy were ſo well covered, that they could deliberately take aim without the leaſt danger to themſelves: the carnage was therefore great, and the troops began to fall into confuſion, after ſeveral repeated attacks, which laſted above four hours, under the moſt diſadvantageous circumſtances.

The general by this time plainly perceived that no hope of ſucceſs remained; and in order to prevent a total defeat, reſolved to retreat with his army, which retired unmoleſted to their former camp, with the loſs of about eighteen hundred men killed or wounded, including a great number of officers. Every corps of regular troops exerted themſelves on this unfortunate occaſion with remarkable bravery; but the greateſt loſs was ſuſtained by lord John Murray's regiment, of which above one half of the private men, and twenty-five officers, were either ſlain upon the ſpot, or deſperately wounded.

Mr. Abercrombie, unwilling to ſtay in the neighbourhood of the enemy, with forces which had received ſuch a ſevere check, retired to the batteaus, and reimbarking his troops, returned to the camp at Lake George, from whence he had taken his departure. The public were very free in their cenſures upon the conduct of this general. He was commended indeed for drawing off his men from a deſperate attack, in which they were expoſed to the fire of an enemy who lay ſecure in impregnable intrenchments: but his ordering his troops to ſtorm ſuch a camp without artillery, when he had a ſufficient train for that ſervice; his never advancing in perſon to the field of battle, when his preſence was ſo indiſpenſibly neceſſary, but remaining at the ſaw-mills, two miles from the ſcene of action; his flying from the neighbourhood of an enemy who never amounted to above three thouſand; and to whom he would have been ſuperior, even though they had been joined by the expected reinforcements: in theſe and many other reſpects he is ſaid to have acted in a manner very unbecoming the character of a good general.

He might, it was affirmed, have remained on the ſpot, in order to execute ſome other enterprize when he ſhould be reinforced in his turn; for general Amherſt no ſooner heard of his diſaſter than he returned with the troops from Cape Breton to New England, after having left a ſtrong garriſon at Louiſbourg. At the head of ſix regiments he began his march to Albany, about the middle of September, in order to join the forces on the lake, that they might undertake ſome other ſervice before the ſeaſon ſhould be exhauſted.

In the mean time, general Abercrombie had detached lieutenant-colonel Bradſtreet with a body of three thouſand men, chiefly provincials, to execute a plan which this officer had formed againſt Cadaraqui, or Fort Frontenac, ſituated on the north ſide of the river St. Laurence, juſt where it takes its riſe from the Lake Ontario. To the ſide of this lake he advanced with his detachment; and embarking in ſome ſloops and batteaus provided for the purpoſe, landed within a mile of Fort Frontenac, the garriſon of which, conſiſting of one hundred and ten men, with a few Indians, immediately ſurrendered priſoners of war. In this fortreſs, which commanded the mouth of the river St. Laurence, and ſerved as a magazine to the more ſouthern caſtles, Mr. Bradſtreet found ſixty pieces of cannon, ſixteen ſmall mortars, with an immenſe quantity of merchandize and proviſions, depoſited for the uſe of the French forces detached againſt brigadier Forbes, their weſtern garriſons, and Indian allies, as well as for the ſubſiſtence of the corps commanded by M. de Levi, on his enterprize againſt the Mohawk river.

This fort he not only reduced without bloodſhed, but alſo made himſelf maſter of all the enemy's ſhipping on the lake, amounting to nine armed veſſels, ſome of which carried eighteen guns. Two of theſe Mr. Bradſtreet conveyed to Oſwego, whither he returned with his troops, after he had deſtroyed Fort Frontenac, with all the artillery, ſtores, proviſion, and merchandize, which it contained. By this loſs the French troops to the ſouthward were expoſed to the hazard of ſtarving; but it is not eaſy to conceive the general's reaſon for giving orders to abandon and deſtroy a fort which, if properly ſtrengthened and ſuſtained, might have rendered the Engliſh maſters of the Lake Ontario, and grievouſly incommoded the enemy, both in their commerce and expeditions to the weſtward.

Mean while the expedition againſt Fort du Queſne was proſecuted with great activity by brigadier Forbes, who with his little army began his march on the thirtieth day of June, from Philadelphia for the river Ohio, a prodigious track of country very little known, deſtitute of military roads, incumbered with mountains, moraſſes, and woods, that were almoſt impaſſable. It was not without incredible difficulty that he procured proviſions and carriages for this expedition, formed new roads, extended ſcouting parties, ſecured camps, and ſurmounted many other obſtructions in the courſe of his tedious march, during which he was alſo harraſſed by ſmall detachments of the enemy's Indians.

Having advanced with the main body as far as Ray's Town, at the diſtance of ninety miles from Fort du Queſne, and ſent before him colonel Bouquet with two thouſand men, about fifty miles farther, to a place called Lyal-Henning, this officer detached major Grant at the head of eight hundred men, to reconnoitre the fort and its outworks. The enemy obſerving his approach, ſent a body of troops againſt him ſufficient to ſurround his whole detachment: a very warm action began: the Engliſh maintained it with their uſual courage for three hours againſt cruel odds; but at length, being overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to give way, and retired in diſorder to Lyal Henning, with the loſs of about three hundred men killed or taken, including major Grant, who was carried priſoner to Fort du Queſne, and nineteen officers.

Notwithſtanding this ſevere check, brigadier Forbes advanced with the army, determined to proſecute his operations with the utmoſt vigour; but the enemy dreading the proſpect of a ſiege, diſmantled and abandoned the fort, and retired down the river Ohio, to their ſettlements on the Miſſiſippi. They deſerted the fort on the twenty-fourth of November, and next day it was occupied by the Britiſh forces. As for the Indians of this country, they ſeemed heartily to renounce their connections with France, and ſubmitted to the dominion of his Britannic majeſty.

Brigadier Forbes having repaired the fort, changed its name from Du Queſne to Pittſburg, furniſhed it with a garriſon of Provincials, and concluded treaties of friendſhip and alliance with the Indian tribes. Then he marched back to Philadelphia, and in his return built a blockhouſe near Lyal Henning, for the protection of Penſylvania; but he himſelf did not long ſurvive theſe tranſactions: his conſtitution having been broken by the incredible fatigues he had undergone, he died ſoon after, univerſally regretted.

Thus have we given a particular account of all the remarkable events that happened during this campaign on the continent of America. The reader will be convinced, that notwithſtanding the defeat at Ticonderoga, and the diſaſter of the advanced party in the neighbourhood of Fort du Queſne, the arms of Great Britain acquired many important advantages, and indeed paved the way for the reduction of Quebec, and conqueſt of all Canada. In the mean time, the admirals Boſcawen and Hardy, having left a conſiderable ſquadron at Halifax in Nova Scotia, returned with four ſhips of the line to England, where they arrived in the beginning of November, after having given chace to ſix large French ſhips which they diſcovered to the weſtward of Scilly, but could not overtake or bring to an engagement.

The Engliſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa being deemed inſecure whilſt France kept poſſeſſion of the iſland of Goree, the miniſtry of Great Britain reſolved to crown the campaign in this part of the world with the reduction of that fortreſs. For this purpoſe commodore Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle, was veſted with the command of a ſquadron, conſiſting of four ſhips of the line, ſeveral frigates, two bomb-ketches, and ſome tranſports, having on board ſeven hundred regular troops, commanded by colonel Worge, and embarked in the harbour of Corke in Ireland, from whence this whole armament took their departure on the eleventh of November.

After a difficult and dangerous paſſage, in which they touched at the iſland of Teneriffe, they arrived at Goree in the latter end of December, and the commodore made a diſpoſition for attacking this iſland, which was remarkably ſtrong by nature, but very indifferently fortified. Goree is a ſmall barren iſland, extending about three quarters of a mile in length, of a triangular form, and on the ſouth-weſt ſide riſing into a rocky hill, on which the ſmall fort of St. Michael is ſituated. There is another, ſtill more conſiderable, called St. Francis, towards the other extremity of the iſland; and ſeveral batteries were raiſed around its circumference, mounted with about one hundred pieces of cannon and four mortars. The French governor, M de St. Jean, had great plenty of ammunition, and his garriſon amounted to three hundred men, excluſive of as many negro inhabitants.

The flat-bottomed boats for landing the troops being hoiſted out, and ranged along-ſide of the different tranſports, the commodore ſtationed his ſhips on the weſt ſide of the iſland, and the engagement began with a ſhell from one of the ketches. This was a ſignal for the great ſhips, which poured in their broadſides without intermiſſion, and the fire was returned with equal vivacity from all the batteries of the iſland. In the courſe of the action, the cannonading from the ſhips became ſo ſevere and terrible, that the French garriſon fled from their quarters in ſpite of all the efforts of the governor, who endeavoured to keep them to their duty; but was obliged to ſtrike his colours, and ſurrender at diſcretion, after a ſhort but warm diſpute, in which the loſs of the Britiſh forces hardly amounted to one hundred men killed and wounded.

The ſucceſs of the day was the more extraordinary, as the French garriſon had not loſt a man, except one negro killed by the burſting of a bomb-ſhell, and the number of their wounded was very inconſiderable. The enemy's colours being ſtruck, as a ſignal of ſubmiſſion, the commodore ſent a detachment of marines on ſhore, who diſarmed the garriſon, and hoiſted the Britiſh flag upon the caſtle of St. Michael. In the mean time, the governor and the reſt of the priſoners were diſtributed among the ſhipping. Thus the important iſland of Goree fell into the hands of the Engliſh, together with two trading veſſels that happened to be at anchor in the road; and ſtores, money, and merchandize, to the value of twenty thouſand pounds.

Part of the troops being left in garriſon at Goree, under the command of major Newton, together with three ſloops for his ſervice; the ſquadron being watered and refreſhed from the continent, that part of which is governed by one of the Jalof kings; and the priſoners with their baggage being diſpatched in three cartel-ſhips to France, the commodore ſet ſail for Senegal, and reinforced Fort Louis with the reſt of the troops under colonel Worge, who was about this time favoured with a viſit by the king of Legibelli. Great pains were taken by the colonel to ſecure the friendſhip of this potentate, though he could not comply with all his requeſts, inaſmuch as he deſired him to eſpouſe his cauſe againſt ſome of the neighbouring nations; a favour which he could by no means grant, with any regard to the intereſt of his country.

Commodore Keppel having reduced Goree, and reinforced the garriſon at Senegal, returned to England, where all his ſhips arrived, after a very tempeſtuous voyage, in which the ſquadron had been diſperſed.

This expedition, however ſucceſsful in the main, was attended with one misfortune, namely, the loſs of the Litchfield ſhip of war, commanded by captain Barton, which, together with one tranſport and bomb-tender, was wrecked on the coaſt of Barbary, about nine leagues to the northward of Saffy, in the dominions of Morocca. One hundred and thirty men, including ſeveral officers, periſhed on this occaſion; but the captain and the reſt of the company, to the number of two hundred and twenty, made ſhift to gain the ſhore, where they ran the riſque of ſtarving, and were cruelly uſed by the natives, although a treaty of peace at that time ſubſiſted between Great Britain and Morocco: nay, they were even enſlaved by the emperor, who detained them in captivity until they were ranſomed by the Britiſh government.

The incidents of the war that happened in the Weſt Indies, during theſe tranſactions, were neither numerous nor important. Nothing of conſequence was atchieved in the neighbourhood of Jamaica, where admiral Cotes commanded a ſmall ſquadron, from which he detached cruiſers occaſionally for the protection of the Britiſh commerce; and at Antigua the trade was effectually ſecured by the vigilance of captain Tyrrel, an officer of diſtinguiſhed merit.

In the month of March this gentleman, with his own ſhip the Buckingham, and the Cambridge, another of the line, deſtroyed a fort on the iſland of Martinique, and ſunk four privateers riding under its protection: but his valour was much more eminently diſplayed in a ſubſequent engagement, which happened in the month of November. Being detached on a cruiſe in his own ſhip the Buckingham by commodore Moore, who commanded at the Leeward Iſlands, he fell in with the Weſel ſloop, commanded by captain Boles, between the iſlands of Montſerrat and Guadalupe, and immediately diſcovered a fleet of nineteen ſail, under convoy of a French ſhip of war carrying ſeventy-four cannon, and two large frigates.

Captain Tyrrel immediately gave chace with all the ſail he could carry; and the Wezel, running cloſe to the enemy, received a whole broadſide from the large ſhip, which however ſhe ſuſtained without much damage: nevertheleſs, Mr. Tyrrel ordered her commander to keep aloof, as he could not be ſuppoſed able to bear the ſhock of large metal, and he himſelf prepared for the engagement. The enemy's large ſhip, the Floriſſant, though of much greater force than the Buckingham, inſtead of waiting her approach, made a running fight with her ſtern-chace, while the two frigates harraſſed him in his courſe, ſometimes raking him fore and aft, and ſometimes lying on his quarter.

At length he came along-ſide of the Floriſſant, within piſtol-ſhot, and poured in a whole broadſide, which did conſiderable execution. The ſalutation was returned with equal vivacity, and a furious engagement enſued. Captain Tyrrel was wounded in the face, and loſt three fingers of his right hand; ſo that being entirely diſabled, he was obliged to transfer the command of the ſhip to his firſt lieutenant, Mr. Marſhal, who continued the battle battle with great gallantry until he loſt his life: then the charge devolved to the ſecond lieutenant, who acquitted himſelf with equal bravery, and ſuſtained a deſperate fight againſt the three ſhips of the enemy.

The officers and crew of the Buckingham exerted themſelves with equal vigour and deliberation; and captain Troy, who commanned a detachment of marines on the poop, plied his ſmall arms ſo effectually as to drive the French from their quarters. At length confuſion, terror, and uproar, prevailing on board the Floriſſant, her firing ceaſed, and her colours were hauled down about the twilight: but her commander, obſerving that the Buckingham was too much damaged in her rigging to purſue with any hope of ſucceſs, ordered all his ſails to be ſet, and eſcaped in the dark with his two conſorts. Nothing but this circumſtance could have prevented a Britiſh ſhip of ſixty-five guns, containing but four hundred and ſeventy-two men, from taking a French ſhip of the line, mounted with ſeventy-four pieces of cannon, provided with ſeven hundred men, and aſſiſted by two large frigates, one of thirty-eight, and the other of twenty-eight guns.

The loſs of the Buckingham in this action did not exceed fifty men in killed and wounded; whereas the number of the ſlain on board the Floriſſant did not fall ſhort of one hundred and eighty, and that of her wounded is ſaid to have amounted to above three hundred. She was ſo diſabled in her hull that ſhe could hardly be kept above water, until ſhe reached Martinique, where ſhe was repaired; and the largeſt frigate, together with the loſs of forty men, ſuſtained ſuch damage as to be for ſome time quite unfit for ſervice.

The military tranſactions in the Eaſt Indies were chequered with a variety of fortune; but, on the whole, the deſigns of the enemy were entirely diſappointed. The French king had ſent a conſiderable reinforcement to that part of the world, under the command of general Lally, an officer of Iriſh extraction, together with ſuch a number of ſhips as rendered the ſquadron of M. d'Apché ſuperior to that of admiral Pocock, who had ſucceeded admiral Watſon, lately deceaſed, in the command of the Engliſh fleet ſtationed on the coaſt of Coromandel, which in the beginning of this year was joined by ſeveral ſhips from England, under the direction of commodore Stevens.

Immediately after this junction, which was effected in the road of Madras on the twenty-fifth of March, admiral Pocock, who had already diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage, vigilance, and conduct, proceeded to windward, with a view to intercept the French ſquadron, of which he had received intelligence. In two days he diſcovered in the road of Fort St. David the enemy's fleet, conſiſting of nine ſhips, which immediately ſtood out to ſea, and formed the line of battle a-head. The admiral took the ſame precaution, and bearing down upon M. d'Apché, the engagement began about three in the afternoon.

The French commodore having maintained a warm fight for about two hours, bore away with his whole fleet; and being reinforced by two ſhips, formed a line of battle again to leeward. Admiral Pocock's own ſhip and three others being greatly diſabled in their maſts and rigging, two of his captains having miſbehaved in the action, and night coming on, he did not think proper to purſue them with all the ſail he could carry; nevertheleſs he followed them at a proper diſtance, ſtanding to the ſouth-weſt, in order to preſerve the weather-gage, in caſe he ſhould have an opportunity to renew the action in the morning.

In this expectation, however, he was diſappointed: the enemy ſhewed no lights, nor made any ſignals that could be obſerved; and in the morning they had entirely diſappeared. Mr. Pocock, on the ſuppoſition that they had weathered him in the night, endeavoured to work up after them to windward; but finding he loſt ground conſiderably, he dropped anchor about three leagues to the northward of Sadras, and received intelligence from the chief of that ſettlement, that one of the largeſt French ſhips having been greatly damaged in the engagement, was run aſhore to the ſouthward of Alamparve, where their whole ſquadron lay at anchor.

Such was the iſſue of the firſt action between the Engliſh and French ſquadrons in the Eaſt Indies, which, over and above the loſs of a capital ſhip, is ſaid to have coſt the enemy about five hundred men, whereas the Britiſh admiral did not loſe one fifth part of that number. Being diſſatisfied with the behaviour of three of his captains, he no ſooner returned to Madraſs than he appointed a court-martial to enquire into their conduct; in conſequence of which two of them were diſmiſſed from that ſervice, and the third was ſentenced to loſe one year's rank as a poſt captain.

In the mean time Mr. Lally had landed his troops at Pondicherry, and taking the field, immediately laid ſiege to Fort St. David, while the French blocked it up by ſea. Two Engliſh ſhips being at anchor in the road when the enemy arrived, their captains ſeeing no poſſibility of eſcaping, ran them on ſhore, ſet them on fire, and retired with their men into the fort, which however was in a few days ſurrendered.

Admiral Pocock having, to the beſt of his power, refitted his ſhattered ſhips, ſet ſail again on the tenth of May, in order to attempt the relief of Fort St. David's; but, notwithſtanding his utmoſt endeavours, he could not reach it in time to be of any ſervice. On the thirtieth day of the month he arrived in the neighbourhood of Pondicherry, from whence the French ſquadron ſtood away early next morning; nor was it in his power by any means to overtake them, though he made all poſſible efforts for that purpoſe. Then receiving intelligence that Fort St. David's was ſurrendered to the enemy, he ſailed back again to Madraſs, in order to refreſh his ſquadron.

On the twenty-fifth of July he ſet ſail a third time in queſt of M. d'Apché, and in two days diſcovered his ſquadron, conſiſting of eight ſhips of the line and a frigate, at anchor in the road of Pondicherry. They no ſooner perceived him approaching than they ſtood out to ſea as before, and he continued to chace in hope of bringing them to an engagement; but all his endeavours proved ineffectual till the third day of Auguſt, when having gained the weather-gage, he bore down upon them in order of battle.

The engagement began with great fury on both ſides; but in little more than ten minutes M. d'Apché ſet his foreſail and bore away, his whole ſquadron following his example, and maintaining a running fight in a very irregular line. The Britiſh admiral then made a ſignal for a general chace, which the enemy obſerving, thought proper to cut away their boats, and croud with all the ſail they could carry. They eſcaped by favour of the night into the road of Pondicherry, and Mr. Pocock anchored with his ſquadron off Carical, a French ſettlement, having thus obtained an undiſputed victory, with the loſs of thirty men killed, and one hundred and ſixteen wounded, including commodore Stevens and captain Martin, though their wounds were not dangerous.

The number of killed and wounded on board of the French ſquadron amounted, according to report, to five hundred and forty; and their ſhips were ſo much ſhattered, that in the beginning of September their commodore ſailed for the iſlands of Bourbon, in the ſame latitude with Madagaſcar, in order to refit; thus leaving the dominion and ſovereignty of the Indian ſeas to the Engliſh admiral, whoſe fleet, from the beginning of this campaign, had been much inferior to the French ſquadron in number of ſhips and men, as well as in weight of metal.

Mr. Lally, having made himſelf maſter of Cudalore and Fort St. David's, reſolved to extort a ſum of money from the king of Tanjour, on pretence that, in the laſt war, he had given an obligation to the French governor, for a certain ſum which had never been paid. Accordingly, he advanced with a body of three thouſand men into the dominions of Tanjour, and demanded ſeventy-two lack of rupees. This extravagant demand being rejected, he plundered Nagare, a trading town on the ſea coaſt, and afterwards laid ſiege to the capital; but after he had proſecuted his operations until a breach was made in the walls, his proviſions and ammunition beginning to fail, ſeveral vigorous ſallies being made by the forces of the king of Tanjour, and the place well defended by European gunners, ſent from the Engliſh garriſon at Trichenopoli, he found himſelf obliged to abandon the enterprize and retreat in a hurry, with the loſs of his artillery.

He arrived at Carical about the middle of Auguſt, and from thence returned to Pondicherry towards the latter end of September. He afterwards quartered his troops in the province of Arcot, took poſſeſſion of the city without the leaſt reſiſtance, and began to make preparations for the ſiege of Madraſs, which ſhall be recorded among the tranſactions of the enſuing year. In the mean time, the land forces belonging to the Eaſt India company were ſo much out-numbered by the reinforcements which arrived with Mr. Lally, that they could not pretend to make head againſt the enemy, but were obliged to remain on the defenſive, and provide as well as they could for the ſecurity of Fort St. George, and the other ſettlements in that part of India.

Having thus related, with as much preciſion as is conſiſtent with perſpicuity, the events of the war in Europe, America, Africa, and Aſia, I ſhall cloſe the foreign tranſactions of this year with laying before the reader ſome account of the ſtate, as well as hiſtory, of the different courts of Europe at the end of the campaign. I have formerly obſerved, that the events of the campaign in Germany produced no change in the political ſyſtems adopted by the different princes on the continent.

The king of Spain wiſely continued to adhere to that neutrality which he had hitherto obſerved, notwithſtanding the intrigues of the French partizans at the court of Madrid, who endeavoured to alarm his jealouſy by the conqueſts which the Engliſh had projected in America.

The king of Sardinia ſagaciouſly kept aloof, reſolving, in imitation of his predeceſſors, to preſerve his power on a reſpectable footing, and be ready to take advantage of all opportunities to extend and promote the intereſt of his crown, and the commerce of his ſubjects.

As for the king of Portugal, he had prudently embraced the ſame maxims of forbearance; but in the latter end of the ſeaſon his attention was ingroſſed by a domeſtic incident of a very extraordinary nature. Whether he had, by particular inſtances of ſeverity, provoked the reſentment of certain individuals, or exerciſed his dominion in ſuch acts of arbitrary power as excited a general ſpirit of diſaffection among his nobility; or, laſtly, by the vigorous meaſures purſued againſt the encroaching jeſuits in Paraguay, and their correſpondents in Portugal, had expoſed himſelf to the hatred of that ſociety, I ſhall not pretend to determine: perhaps all theſe motives concurred in giving birth to a conſpiracy againſt his life, which was actually executed at this juncture with the moſt deſperate reſolution.

On the third day of September the king, according to cuſtom, going out in a carriage to take the air, attended by one domeſtic, was, in the night, at a ſolitary place near Belem, attacked by three men on horſeback, armed with blunderbuſſes, one of whom fired his piece at the coachman without effect. The man, however, terrified both on his own account and that of his ſovereign, drove the mules at full ſpeed; a circumſtance which, in ſome meaſure, diſconcerted the other two conſpirators, who purſued him at full gallop; and having no leiſure to take aim, diſcharged their pieces at random through the back of the carriage. The ſlugs with which they were loaded happened to paſs between the king's right arm and his breaſt, dilacerating the parts from the ſhoulder to the elbow, but without damaging the bone, or penetrating into the cavity of the body.

Finding himſelf grievouſly wounded, and the blood flowing apace, he, with ſuch preſence of mind as cannot be ſufficiently admired, inſtead of proceeding to the palace, which was at ſome diſtance, ordered the coachman to return to Junqueira, where his principal ſurgeon reſided, and there his wounds were immediately dreſſed. By this reſolution, he not only prevented the irreparable miſchief that might have ariſen from an exceſſive effuſion of blood, but, without all doubt, ſaved his life from the hands of other aſſaſſins poſted on the road to accompliſh the murder, in caſe he ſhould eſcape alive from the firſt attack. This inſtance of the king's recollection was magnified into a miracle, on the ſuppoſition that it muſt have been the effect of divine inſpiration; and indeed, among a people addicted to ſuperſtition, might well paſs for a favourable interpoſition of Providence.

The king being thus disabled in his right arm, bestowed, by a public decree, the absolute power of government upon the queen his consort. In the mean time, no person had access to his presence but herself, the first minister, the cardinal de Saldanha, the physicians, and surgeons. An embargo was immediately laid on all the shipping in the port of Lisbon. Rewards were publicly offered, together with a promise of pardon to the accomplices, for discovering any of the assassins; and such other measures taken, that in a little time the whole conspiracy was unfolded: a conspiracy the more dangerous, as it appeared to have been formed by persons of the first quality and influence.

The duke de Aveiro, of the family of Mascarenhas; the marquis de Tavora, who had been viceroy of Goa, and now actually enjoyed the commission of general of the horse; the count de Attouguia, the marquis de Alloria, together with their wives, children, and whole families, were arrested immediately after the assassination, as principals in the design; and many other accomplices, including some jesuits, were apprehended in the sequel. The further particulars relating to this affair, with the fate of the conspirators, shall be related among the transactions of the ensuing year. At present it will be sufficient to observe, that the king's wounds were productive of no bad consequences; nor did the imprisonment of the conspirators occasion any disturbance in the kingdom.

The internal tranquility of France continued to be disturbed by the disputes between the parliaments and clergy, concerning the bull Unigenitus. In vain the king had exerted his authority; first proposing an accommodation; then commanding the parliaments to desist from taking cognizance of a religious contest, which did not fall under their jurisdiction; and, thirdly, banishing their persons, and annulling their power. He afterwards found it necessary to recal and reinstate those venerable patriots; and, being convinced of the intolerable insolence and turbulent spirit of the archbishop of Paris, had exiled that prelate in his turn.

He was no sooner restored to his function than he resumed his former conduct, touching the denial of sacraments to those who refused to acknowledge the bull Unigenitus. He even acted with redoubled zeal; intrigued with the other prelates; caballed among the inferior clergy; and not only revived, but augmented the troubles throughout the whole kingdom. Bishops, curates, and monks, presumed to with-hold spiritual consolation from persons in extremity, and were punished by the civil power. Other parliaments of the kingdom followed the example set them by that of Paris, in asserting their authority and privileges. The king commanded them to desist, on pain of incurring his displeasure: they remonstrated and persevered; while the archbishop repeated his injunctions and censures, and continued to inflame the dispute to such a dangerous degree, that he was given to understand he should be again obliged to quit the capital, if he did not proceed with more moderation.

These domestic disputes, however, did not prevent the French ministry from concerting proper measures to prosecute the war in Europe and America. In the course of this year they had not only considerably reinforced their armies in Germany, but made surprising efforts to supply the colony of Canada with troops, artillery, stores, and ammunition, for its defence against the operations of the British forces, which greatly outnumbered the French upon that continent. The court of Versailles employed every stratagem to elude the vigilance of the British cruisers. The ships destined for America they detached, both single and in covoys, sometimes from the Mediterranean, sometimes from their harbours in the Channel. They assembled transports in one port, in order to divert the attention of the English from another where their convoys lay ready for sailing; and in boisterous weather, when the British men of war could no longer block up their harbours, their store ships came forth, and hazarded the voyage for the relief of their American settlements.

Those that had the good fortune to arrive on the coast of that continent were obliged to have recourse to different expedients for escaping the British squadrons stationed at Halifax, or cruising in the bay of St. Laurence. They either ventured to enter the river, before it was clear of the ice, so early in the spring, that the English had not yet left the harbour of Nova Scotia; or they waited on the coast of Newfoundland for such thick fogs as might screen them from the notice of the British commanders in sailing up the gulph; or, lastly, they penetrated through the Streights of Belleisle; a dangerous passage, which however led them directly into the river St. Laurence, at a considerable distance above the station of the English squadron.

Though the French navy was by this time so diminished, that it could neither cope with the English by sea, nor furnish proper convoys for their commerce; this circumstance did not hinder the ministry of that kingdom from alarming Great Britain with the fears of an invasion. Flat-bottomed boats were built, transports collected, large ships of war equipped, and troops ordered to assemble on the coast for embarkation: but this was no more than a feint to excite the apprehensions of the English, embarrass the administration, prejudice the national credit, and deter the government from sending forces to Germany, to prosecute the war in that quarter.

A much more effectual method they took to distress the trade of England, by laying up their useless ships of war, and encouraging of stout privateers, that did considerable damage to the commerce of Great Britain and Ireland, by cruising in the seas of Europe and America. Some of them lay close in the harbours of the Channel, fronting the coast of England, and darted out occasionally on the trading ships of this nation, as they received intelligence from boats employed for that purpose. Some chose their station in the North Sea, where a great number of captures were made upon the coast of Scotland: others cruised in the chops of the Channel, and even to the westward of Ireland; but the far greater number scoured the seas in the neighbourhood of the Leeward Islands in the West Indies, where they took a prodigious number of British ships sailing to and from the sugar colonies, and carried them to their own settlements in Martinique, Guadalupe, or St. Domingo.

The

The Dutch ſtill continued to perſevere in the ſame baſe and diſingenuous conduct which they had invariably obſerved ſince the commencement of the war. I have, in the beginning of this year's tranſactions, remarked, that a great number of their ſhips were taken by the Engliſh cruizers, and condemned as legal prizes, for having French property on board: that the Dutch merchants, enraged at their loſſes, exclaimed againſt the Engliſh as pirates and robbers, petitioned the States for redreſs in very high terms, and even loudly clamoured for a war againſt Great Britain.

The charge of violence and injuſtice which they brought againſt the Engliſh, for taking and confiſcating the ſhips that tranſported to Europe the produce of the French in the Weſt Indies, they founded on the tenth article of a treaty of commerce between Great Britain and the States-general of the United Provinces, concluded in the year 1668, ſtipulating, "That whatever ſhall be found on board the ſhips of the ſubjects of the United Provinces, though the lading or part thereof may belong to the enemies of Great Britain, ſhall be free and unmoleſted, except theſe be prohibited goods, which are to be ſerved in the manner preſcribed by the foregoing articles." From this article the Dutch merchants inferred, that if there be no prohibited goods on board, the Engliſh had no right to ſtop or moleſt any of their ſhips, or make the leaſt enquiry to whom the merchandize belonged, whence it was brought, or whither bound.

This plea the Engliſh miniſtry would by no means admit, for the following reaſons; a general and perpetual licence to carry on the whole trade of their enemy, would be ſuch a glaring abſurdity as no convention could authorize: common ſenſe has dictated, and Grotius declared, that no man can be ſuppoſed to have conſented to an abſurdity; therefore the interpretation given by the Dutch to this article, could not be ſuppoſed to be its true and genuine meaning, which indeed relates to nothing more than the common courſe of trade, as it was uſually carried on in time of peace. But, even ſhould their interpretation be accepted, the article and the treaty itſelf would be ſuperſeded and annulled by a ſubſequent treaty, concluded between the two nations in 1675, and often confirmed ſince that period, ſtipulating, in a ſecret article, "That neither of the contracting parties ſhould give, nor conſent that any of their ſubjects and inhabitants ſhould give any aid, favour, or counſel, directly or indirectly, by ſea or land, or on the freſh waters; nor ſhould furniſh or permit the ſubjects or inhabitants of their reſpective territories, to furniſh any ſhips, ſoldiers, ſeamen, victuals, money, inſtruments of war, gunpowder, or any other neceſſaries for making war, to the enemies of either party, of any rank or condition ſoever."

Now the Dutch had violated this article in many inſtances during the preſent war, both in Europe and America; and as they had ſo openly contravened one treaty, the Engliſh were not obliged to obſerve any other. They had, moreover, forfeited all right to the obſervance of the treaty in queſtion, by refuſing the ſuccours with which they were bound, in the moſt ſolemn manner, to furniſh the king of Great Britain, in caſe any of his territories in Europe ſhould be attacked; for nothing could be more weak and frivolous than the allegation upon which this refuſal was founded; namely, that the hoſtilities in Europe were commenced by the Engliſh, when they ſeized and confiſcated the veſſels of France; and they, being the aggreſſors, had no right to inſiſt upon the ſuccours ſtipulated in a treaty which was purely defenſive. If this argument has any weight, the treaty itſelf is totally annulled. The French, as they did in the preſent caſe, will always begin the war in America: and when their ſhips, containing reinforcements and ſtores for the maintenance of that war, ſhall be taken on the European ſeas, perhaps in conſequence of their being expoſed for that purpoſe, they will exclaim that the Engliſh were the aggreſſors in Europe, conſequently intitled to receive no benefit from the defenſive treaty ſubſiſting between them and the States-general of the United Provinces. It being impoſſible for the Engliſh to put an end to the war, while their enemies are enabled to maintain it by their commerce carried on in neutral bottoms, they are obliged to ſuppreſs ſuch iniquitous colluſion by that neceſſity which Grotius himſelf hath admitted to be a ſufficient excuſe for deviating from the letter of any treaty whatever.

In time of peace no Dutch ſhips were allowed to carry the produce of any French ſugar iſland, or even to trade in any of the French ports in America or the Weſt Indies; conſequently the treaty which they quote can never juſtify them in carrying on a commerce which, as it did not exiſt, and was not foreſeen, could not poſſibly be prohibited when that convention was ratified. Grotius, whoſe authority is held as uncontrovertible among the Dutch, has aſſerted, that every nation has a right to ſeize and confiſcate the goods of any neutral power which ſhall attempt to carry them into any place which is blocked up by that nation, either by land or ſea. The French iſlands in the Weſt Indies were ſo blocked up by the Engliſh cruiſers, that they could receive no relief from their own government; conſequently no neutral power could attempt to ſupply them without falling under this predicament.

It was for theſe reaſons that the king of England declared, by the mouth of Mr. Yorke, his miniſter plenipotentiary at the Hague, in a conference held in the month of Auguſt with the deputies of the States general, "That though he was ready to concur in every meaſure that ſhould be propoſed for giving ſatisfaction to their High Mightineſſes, with whom he had always ſtudied to live in the moſt perfect union, he was nevertheleſs determined, not to ſuffer the trade of the French colonies in America to be carried on by the ſubjects of other powers, under the ſpecious pretext of neutrality; nor to permit words to be interpreted as a licence to drive a trade with his enemies, which, though not particularly ſpecified in the articles of contraband, was nevertheleſs rendered ſuch in all reſpects, and in every ſenſe, by the nature of the circumſtances."

Beſides the univerſal clamour excited in Holland, and the famous memorial delivered to the States-general, which we have already mentioned, a deputation of merchants waited four times ſucceſſively on the princeſs regent, to repreſent their grievances, and ſolicit her concurrence in augmenting the navy for the preſervation of their commerce. She promiſed to employ her beſt offices with the court of Great Britain; and theſe cooperating with the repreſentation made by the States-general, the Engliſh miniſter was empowered to open conferences at the Hague, in order to ſettle the preſent diſpute by an amicable accommodation.

Theſe endeavours, however, were not attended with the deſired effect. The Britiſh cruiſers continued to take, and the Britiſh courts to condemn, all Dutch veſſels carrying the produce of the French ſugar iſlands. The merchants of Holland and Zealand renewed their complaints with redoubled vehemence, and all the trading part of the nation, reinforced by the whole party that oppoſed the houſe of Orange, cried aloud for an immediate augmentation of the marine, and repriſals upon the Engliſh navy. The princeſs-regent, in order to avoid extremities, was obliged not only to exert all her intereſt with the States-general, but alſo to play off one faction againſt another, in the way of remonſtrance and exclamation.

So early as the month of June ſhe preſented a memorial to the States-general, reminding them, that in the beginning of the war between France and England, ſhe had recommended an augmentation of their land forces, to ſtrengthen the garriſons of the frontier towns, and cover the territories of the republic from invaſion. She obſerved, that the provinces of Gueldres and Overyſſel, alarmed by the proximity of two formidable armies, had reſolved to demand, that the augmentation of their land-forces ſhould be taken into conſideration by the other provinces; and requeſted her to enforce their ſolicitations that this meaſure might immediately take place. With this requeſt, ſhe ſaid, ſhe had the more readily complied, as ſhe could not but be ſenſible of the imminent danger to which the republic was expoſed, eſpecially ſince the Hanoverian army had paſſed the Rhine; and as it behoved the ſtate to put itſelf in a condition to hinder either army from retiring into the territories of the republic, if it ſhould be defeated; for, in that caſe, the conqueror being authoriſed to purſue his enemy whereever he can find him, would carry the war into the heart of their country.

This repreſentation had no other effect than that of ſuſpending the execution of the meaſure which each party propoſed. The princeſs, in her anſwer to the fourth deputation of the merchants, declared, that ſhe beheld the preſent ſtate of their trade with the moſt anxious concern: that its want of protection was not her fault, but that of the towns of Dort, Haarlem, Amſterdam, Torgau, Rotterdam, and the Brille; to whoſe conduct it was owing that the forces of the ſtate, by ſea and land, were not now on a better footing. The deputies were afterwards referred to her miniſter, M. de la Larrey, to whom they repreſented, that the augmentation of the land forces, and the equipment of a fleet, were matters as diſtinct from each other as light from darkneſs: that there was no preſſing motive for an augmentation of the army; whereas innumerable reaſons rendered the equipment of a fleet a matter of the moſt urgent neceſſity.

In a few days after this repreſentation was made, the princeſs, in an aſſembly of the States-general, requeſted their High Mightineſſes, that ſeeing their earneſt and repeated efforts to perſuade the provinces of Holland, Zealand, Frieſland, and Weſt-Frieſland, to agree to the propoſed augmentation of forces by ſea and land, had not hitherto met with ſucceſs, they would now contrive and concur in ſome feaſible expedient for terminating this affair, and the ſooner the better; in order, on one hand, to ſatisfy the ſtrong and well-grounded inſtances made by the provinces of Gueldres, Utrecht, Overyſſel, and Groningen; and, on the other, to comply with the ardent and juſt deſires expreſſed by the commercial inhabitants of the country.

She told them, that the deputation which waited on her was compoſed of forty merchants, a number that merited attention no leſs than the ſpeech they pronounced, of which a great number of printed copies were diſtributed through all parts of the country. Without making any particular remarks on the harangue, ſhe only obſerved, that the ſpirit of it did not tend to forward the negociation begun with Great-Britain, nor induce the nation to prefer a convention to a rupture with that crown. From this circumſtance ſhe inferred, it was more than time to finiſh the deliberations on the propoſal for augmenting the forces both by ſea and land; a meaſure, ſhe ſaid, without which the ſtate was, and always would be, expoſed to every ſort of danger and misfortune.

In conſequence of this interpoſition, the States-General that ſame day ſent a letter to the ſtates of Holland and Weſt-Frieſland, ſignifying the ſentiments of the Princeſs Regent, and repreſenting the neceſſity of complying with her propoſal of the double augmentation. They obſerved, that an augmentation of the land-forces, for the defence of the frontiers, was no leſs requiſite than an equipment by ſea for the ſecurity of commerce: that the ſtates of the provinces of Gueldres, Utrecht, Overyſſel, and Groningen, concurred with them in the ſame opinion; and accordingly had inſiſted, by divers letters and propoſitions, on thoſe two points ſo eſſential to the public intereſt.

After taking notice of the danger of delay, and the fatal effects of diſcord, they propoſed, that, by a reciprocal indulgence, one party ſhould comply with the ſentiments of the other, in order to avoid a ſchiſm and internal diviſion among the confederates, the conſequences of which would be very alarming; while the republic, in the mean time, would remain in a defenceleſs condition both by ſea and land, and depend, for its ſafety, upon the humour and caprice of its powerful neighbours. They conjured them therefore, as they valued the intereſt of their country, and all that was dear to them; as they regarded the protection of the good inhabitants, the concord and harmony which at all times, but eſpecially at the preſent critical juncture, was of the laſt neceſſity, that they would ſeriouſly reflect upon the exhortations of her royal highneſs, as well as on the repeated inſtances of the majority of the confederates; and take a wiſe and ſalutary reſolution, with regard to the propoſed augmentation of the land-forces; ſo that this addition, together with an equivalent at ſea, might, the ſooner the better, be unanimouſly brought to a concluſion.

In the month of April this year died, in the eighty-fourth year of his age, pope Benedict XIV.

(Proſper Lambertini) a pontiff univerſally eſteemed for his good ſenſe, moderation, and humanity; and in July was ſucceeded in the papacy by cardinal Charles Rezzonico, biſhop of Padua, by birth a Venetian. He was formerly auditor of the Rota; afterwards advanced to the purple by pope Clement XII. at the nomination of the republic of Venice; was diſtinguiſhed by the title of St. Maria d'Ara Cæli, the principal convent of the Cordeliers, and nominated protector of the Pandours, or Illyrians. When he aſcended the papal chair, he aſſumed the name of Clement XIII. in gratitude to the laſt of that name, who was his benefactor. Though of a diſagreeable perſon, and even deformed in his body, he enjoys good health and a vigorous conſtitution. As an eccleſiaſtic, his life is exemplary; his morals are pure and unimpeached: in his character, he is ſaid to be learned, diligent, ſteady, devout, and in every reſpect worthy to ſucceed ſuch a predeceſſor as Benedict.

I ſhall next, previous to my opening the hiſtory of the ſucceeding ſeſſion of parliament, preſent the reader with the moſt remarkable domeſtic occurrences of the year.

It is a circumſtance that redounds greatly to the honour of the Engliſh miniſtry, that, while the operations of the war were vigorouſly carried on in the four quarters of the globe, the iſland of Great Britain, which may be conſidered as the center that gave motion to this vaſt machine, enjoyed all the tranquillity of the moſt profound peace, and ſaw nothing of war but the preparations and trophies, which ſerved only to animate the nation to a deſire of further conqueſt: for the dejection occaſioned by the misfortune at St. Cas ſoon vaniſhed before the proſpect of victory and ſucceſs. Conſidering the agitation naturally produced among the common people, by the practice of preſſing men into the ſervice of the navy, the raiſing of ſo many new corps of ſoldiers, and the endeavours uſed in forming the national militia, very few diſturbances happened to interrupt the internal repoſe of the nation.

Againſt private acts of malice, violence, and rapine, however, no community whatſoever is ſecure. In the month of April the temporary wooden bridge over the Thames, built for the conveniency of carriages and paſſengers, while the workmen ſhould be employed in widening and repairing London-bridge, was maliciouſly ſet on fire in the night, and continued burning till noon next day, when the ruins of it fell into the river. The deſtruction of this conveniency proved very detrimental to the commerce of the city, notwithſtanding the care and diſcretion of the magiſtrates in applying remedies to the preſent misfortune. A promiſe of the king's pardon was offered in a public advertiſement, by the ſecretary of ſtate, and a reward of two hundred pounds by the city of London, to any perſon who ſhould diſcover the perpetrator of ſuch a wicked outrage; but nevertheleſs he eſcaped detection. No individual, nor any ſociety of men, could have the leaſt intereſt in the execution of ſuch a ſcheme, except the body of London watermen: but as no diſcovery was made to the prejudice of any perſon belonging to that ſociety, the deed was imputed to the malice of ſome ſecret enemy of the public. Even after a new temporary bridge was erected, another attempt was made (in all probability by the ſame incendiary) to reduce the whole to aſhes, but happily miſcarried; and a guard was appointed to prevent any ſuch atrocious efforts for the future.

Dangerous tumults were excited in and about Mancheſter, by a prodigious number of manufacturers, who had left off working, and formed a combination to raiſe, by force, the price of their labour. They had concerted a regular plan, and collected large ſums for the maintenance of the poorer ſort, while they refuſed to work for their families. They inſulted and abuſed all thoſe who would not join in this confederacy; diſperſed incendiary letters, and denounced terrible threats againſt all ſuch as ſhould preſume to oppoſe their proceedings. But theſe menaces had no effect upon the magiſtrates and juſtices, who exerted themſelves with ſuch ſpirit and activity, that the ringleaders being apprehended and puniſhed by law, the reſt were ſoon reduced to order.

In the month of June Florence Henſey, an obſcure phyſician, and native of Ireland, who had been arreſted for treaſonable practices, was tried at the court of King's Bench, on an indictment for high-treaſon. In the courſe of the trial it appeared, that he had been employed as a ſpy by the French miniſtry; to whom, in conſideration of a paultry penſion, he ſent intelligence of every material incident in Great Britain. The correſpondence was conducted by his brother, a jeſuit, who acted as chaplain and ſecretary to the Spaniſh ambaſſador at the Hague. The Britiſh reſident at that court having learned from the Spaniſh miniſter ſome ſecrets relating to England, even before they were imparted to him by the Engliſh miniſtry, was induced to ſet on foot an enquiry touching the ſource of this intelligence, and ſoon received information, that the ſecretary of the Spaniſh ambaſſador had a brother, a phyſician, at London. The ſuſpicion occaſioned by this circumſtance being communicated to the miniſtry of England, Henſey was narrowly watched, and twenty-nine of his letters were intercepted. From the contents of theſe he was found guilty of having given the French court the firſt notice of the expedition to North America, the capture of the two ſhips the Alcide and Lys, the ſailing and deſtination of every ſquadron and armament, and the difficulties that occurred in raiſing money for the ſervice of the public. He had even acquainted them that the ſecret expedition of the foregoing year was deſigned againſt Rochefort; and adviſed a deſcent upon Great Britain, at a certain time and place, as the moſt effectual method of diſtreſſing the government, and affecting the public credit. After a long trial he was found guilty of treaſon, and received the ſentence of death uſually pronounced againſt ſuch delinquents: but whether he merited forgiveneſs by ſome material diſcovery, or the miniſtry found him ſo inſenſible and inſignificant that they were aſhamed to take his life, he eſcaped execution, and was indulged with a pardon, on condition of going into perpetual exile.

The laſh of the law fell, with no leſs juſtice, upon one Dr. Shebbeare, who, in a ſeries of printed letters to the people of England, had cenſured the conduct of the miniſtry in the moſt acrimonious terms, ſtigmatized ſome great names with all the virulence of ſatire, and even preſumed to inſult and abuſe the perſon of the ſovereign. The government, enraged at the inſolence, as well as alarmed at the ſucceſs of this author, whoſe writings were bought with avidity by the public, determined to puniſh him ſeverely for his arrogance and preſumption; and he was apprehended by warrant from the Secretary's Office. His Sixth Letter to the People of England was pitched upon as the foundation of a proſecution.

After a ſhort trial, in the court of King's Bench, he was found guilty of having writ the Sixth Letter to the People of England, which was adjudged a libellous pamphlet; ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory, to pay a ſmall fine, to be impriſoned three years, and give ſecurity for his good behaviour for the future: a puniſhment which, however ſeemingly ſevere, was by no means too great for the atrociouſneſs of his crime; as his ſole motive appeared to be to raiſe his own private fortune, which was low, at the expence of diſturbing the peace of his country.

It muſt be obſerved to the honour of the Engliſh, and is univerſally allowed by all foreign nations, that no people in the world are more remarkable for exerting the virtues of charity and benevolence towards the diſtreſſed and forlorn part of their fellow-creatures. In the courſe of this year the public began to reap the benefit of ſeveral admirable inſtitutions of this nature. Mr. Henry Raine, a private gentleman of Middleſex, had, in his life-time, built and endowed an hoſpital for the maintenance of forty poor maidens. By his will he bequeathed a certain ſum of money to accumulate at intereſt, under the management of truſtees, until the yearly produce ſhould amount to two hundred and ten pounds, to be given in marriage portions to two of the maidens educated in his hoſpital, at the age of twenty-two, who ſhould be the beſt recommended for piety and induſtry by the maſters or miſtreſſes whom they had ſerved.

In the month of March the ſum deſtined for this laudable purpoſe was completed, when the truſtees, by public advertiſement, ſummoned the maidens educated in the hoſpital to appear on a certain day, with proper certificates of their behaviour and circumſtances, that ſix of the moſt deſerving might be ſelected to draw lots for the prize of one hundred pounds, to be payed as her marriage portion, provided ſhe married a man of an unblemiſhed character, a member of the church of England, reſiding within certain ſpecified pariſhes, and approved by the truſtees. Accordingly on the firſt day of May the candidates appeared; and the prize being gained by one young woman, in preſence of a numerous aſſembly of all ranks, attracted by curioſity, the other five maidens, with a ſixth, added in lieu of her who had been ſucceſsful, were marked for a ſecond chance on the ſame day of the enſuing November, when a ſecond prize of the ſame value would be preſented. Thus a new candidate will be added every half year, that every maiden, who has been educated in this hoſpital, and been careful of her character, may have a chance for a portion of a hundred pounds, the other five being intended to defray the expence of the wedding entertainment. It is hard to ſay, which ought moſt to be admired, the excellence of the plan, or the generoſity of the founder's intention.

Of no leſs, perhaps of ſtill greater, merit was another charitable eſtabliſhment, which alſo took place about the ſame time. A ſmall number of humane perſons, chiefly citizens of London, deeply affected with the calamitous ſituation of common proſtitutes, who are certainly the moſt wretched of all human creatures, formed a generous reſolution in their favour, ſuch as will reflect eternal honour on the memory of the benefactors. They conſidered that many of thoſe unhappy creatures, ſo miſerable in themſelves, and ſo productive of miſchief to others, had been ſeduced to vice in their tender years by the perfidious artifice of the male ſex, or the violence of unruly paſſion, before they had acquired experience to guard againſt the one, or ſagacity to diſcern the fatal conſequences of the other: that the jewel reputation being thus irretrievably loſt, perhaps in one unguarded moment, they were covered with ſhame and diſgrace, abandoned by their friends, ſhunned by their acquaintance, and thrown on the wide world: that ſtung with ſelf-conviction, inſulted with reproach, denied the privilege of penitence and contrition, cut off from all hope, impelled by indigence, and maddened by deſpair, they had plunged into a life of infamy, in which they were expoſed to deplorable viciſſitudes of miſery, and the moſt excruciating pangs of reflection that any human beings could undergo: that whatever remorſe they might feel, how much ſoever abhor their own vice or long for an opportunity of amendment, they were entirely deſtitute of all means of reformation: they were not only deprived of all poſſibility of profiting by thoſe precious moments of repentance, and becoming again uſeful members of ſociety; but, in order to earn a miſerable ſubſiſtence, were obliged to perſevere in the paths of proſtitution, and act as the inſtruments of heaven's vengeance in propagating diſtemper and profligacy, in ruining the bodies and debauching the minds of their fellow creatures:

Moved to pity by theſe conſiderations, this virtuous band of aſſociates reſolved to provide a comfortable aſylum for female penitents, to which they might fly for ſhelter from the receptacles of vice, the miſeries of life, and the ſcorn of mankind; where they might indulge the ſalutary ſentiments of remorſe, make their peace with heaven, inure themſelves to induſtry and temperance, and be profitably reunited to ſociety, from which they had been ſo unhappily cut off. The plan of this excellent inſtitution being formed, was put in execution by means of voluntary ſubſcription, and the houſe opened in Goodman's fields, under the name of the Magdalen-hoſpital, in the month of Auguſt; when fifty petitions were preſented by penitent proſtitutes, ſoliciting admittance, which was granted to ſeveral. Another aſylum was alſo opened by the hand of private charity, on the Surry-ſide of Weſtminſter bridge, for the reception and education of female orphans, and children deſerted by their parents: and it is to be hoped that the managers of both will be enabled, by the contributions of the humane and compaſſionate, to afford protection to every object labouring under under thoſe ſpecies of diſtreſs which they propoſe to ſuccour.

Nor did the generoſity of the public appear more conſpicuous in relieving the diſtreſſed, than in rewarding the ingenious in every particular branch of the liberal and uſeful arts and ſciences. Several years had already elapſed ſince a ſociety of private perſons was inſtituted at London, for the encouragement of arts, manufactures, and commerce. It conſiſted of a preſident, vice-preſident, ſecretary, regiſter, collector, and other officers, elected from a very conſiderable number of members, who paid a certain yearly contribution for the purpoſes of the inſtitution. In the courſe of every year they held eight general meetings in a large aſſembly-room, built and furniſhed at the common expence; beſides the ordinary meetings of the ſociety held every week, from the ſecond Wedneſday in November to the laſt Wedneſday of May: and, in the intermediate time, on the firſt and third Wedneſday of every month.

At theſe ordinary meetings, provided the number then preſent exceeded ten, the members had a right to proceed upon buſineſs, and power to appoint ſuch committees as they ſhould think neceſſary. The money contributed by this aſſociation, after the neceſſary expence of the ſociety had been deducted, was expended in premiums for planting and huſbandry: for diſcoveries and improvements in chemiſtry, dying, and mineralogy; for promoting the ingenious arts of drawing, engraving, caſting, painting, ſtatuary and ſculpture; for the improvement of manufactures and machines in the various articles of hats, crapes, druggets, mills, marbled paper, ſhip blocks, ſpinning-wheels, toys, yarn, knitting, and weaving.

They likewiſe allotted ſums for the advantage of the Britiſh colonies in America; and beſtowed premiums on thoſe ſettlers who ſhould excel in curing cochineal, planting logwood-trees, cultivating olive-trees, producing myrtle-wax, making pot-aſh, preſerving raiſins, curing ſafflower, making ſilk and wines, importing ſturgeon, preparing iſinglaſs, planting hemp and cinnamon, extracting opium and the gum of the perſimon-tree, collecting ſtones of the mango, which ſhould be found to vegetate in the Weſt-Indies; raiſing ſilk graſs, and laying out provincial gardens. They moreover allowed a gold medal, in honour of him who ſhould compoſe the beſt treatiſe on the arts of peace, containing an hiſtorical account of the progreſſive improvements of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce in the kingdom of England, with the effects of thoſe improvements on the morals and manners of the people, and pointing out the moſt proper means for their future advancement. In a word, the ſociety is ſo numerous, the contributions ſo conſiderable, the plan ſo judiciouſly laid, and executed with ſuch diſcretion and ſpirit, as to promiſe much more effectual and extenſive advantage to the public, than ever accrued from all the boaſted academies of Chriſtendom.

The artiſts of London had long maintained a private academy for improvement in the art of drawing from living figures; but, in order to extend this advantage, which was not attained without difficulty and expence, the duke of Richmond, a young nobleman of the moſt amiable character, provided a large apartment at Whitehall for the uſe of thoſe who ſtudied the arts of painting, ſculpture, and engraving; and furniſhed it with a collection of original plaiſter-caſts from the beſt antique ſtatues and buſts at Rome and Florence. Here any learner had liberty to draw, or make models, under the eye and inſtruction of Meſſ. Wilton and Cipriani, two eminent artiſts; and twice a year the munificent founder beſtowed premiums of ſilver medals on the four pupils who excelled the reſt in drawing from a certain figure, and making the beſt model of it in baſſo-relievo.

Beſides theſe liberal inſtitutions, Mr. Finch and Mr. Townſhend, animated with a laudable zeal for the improvement of learning, beſtowed two prizes of fifteen guineas each upon two ſenior batchelors of arts, and the ſame upon two middle batchelors, in the univerſity of Cambridge, who ſhould compoſe the beſt exerciſes in Latin proſe, to be recited in public.

It is commonly obſerved by foreign nations, and even admitted by the Engliſh themſelves, that no country in the world produces ſuch an infinite variety of original characters, nor gives birth to ſuch a number of ſtrange adventures. Of this nature may be reckoned the following incident relating to his grace the duke of Marlborough, which though it derived its origin from the latter end of the preceding year, and cannot properly be conſidered as belonging to general hiſtory, is yet ſo curious in all its particulars, that the reader, I imagine, will excuſe the digreſſion.

Towards the end of November, in the foregoing year, the abovementioned nobleman received, by the poſt, a letter directed "To his grace the duke of Marlborough, with care and ſpeed," and conceived in theſe terms: "My lord, As ceremony is an idle thing upon moſt occaſions, more eſpecially to perſons in my ſtate of mind, I ſhall proceed immediately to acquaint you with the motive and end of addreſſing this epiſtle to you, which is equally intereſting to us both. You are to know then, that my preſent ſituation in life is ſuch, that I ſhould prefer annihilation to a continuance in it. Deſperate diſeaſes require deſperate remedies; and you are the man I have pitched upon, either to make me or unmake yourſelf. As I never had the honour to live among the great, the tenor of my propoſals will not be very courtly; but let that be an argument to enforce a belief of what I am now going to write. It has employed my invention for ſome time to find out a method of deſtroying another without expoſing my own life: that I have accompliſhed, and defy the law. Now for the application of it. I am deſperate, and muſt be provided for. You have it in your power: it is my buſineſs to make it your inclination to ſerve me; which you muſt determine to comply with, by procuring me a genteel ſupport for my life, or your own will be at a period before this ſeſſion of parliament is over. I have more motives than one for ſingling you out upon this occaſion; and I give you this fair warning, becauſe the means I ſhall make uſe of are too fatal to be eluded by the power of phyſic. If you think this of any conſequence, you will not fail to meet the author on Sunday next, at ten in the morning, or on Monday (if the weather ſhould be rainy on Sunday) near the firſt tree beyond the ſtile in Hyde-Park, in the foot-walk to Kenſington. Secrecy and compliance may preſerve you from a double danger of this ſort, as there is a certain part of the world where your death has more than been wiſhed for upon other motives. I know the world too well to truſt this ſecret in any breaſt but my own. A few days determine me your friend or enemy. Felton *.— You will apprehend that I mean you ſhould be alone; and depend upon it that a diſcovery of any artifice in this affair will be fatal to you. My ſafety is inſured by my ſilence, for confeſſion only can condemn me."

The duke, in conſequence of this extraordinary ſummons, appeared at the time and place appointed. He was on horſeback and alone, with piſtols before him, and the ſtar of his order diſplayed, that he might be the more eaſily known. He had likewiſe taken the precaution of engaging a friend to attend in the Park, though at ſuch a conſiderable diſtance as ſcarce to be perceived. He remained ſome time on the ſpot without ſeeing any perſon whom he could ſuſpect to be the author of the letter he had received, and then rode away; but happening to turn his head when he reached Hyde-Park corner, he obſerved a man ſtanding at the bridge, and looking at the water, within twenty yards of the tree which had been fixed as the place of meeting. He forthwith rode back at a gentle pace, and paſſing the perſon, expected to be addreſſed; but as no advance of this kind was made, he, in repaſſing, bowed to the ſtranger, and aſked, if he had not ſomething to communicate. The man replying, "No, I don't know you;" the duke told his name, adding, "Now you know me, I imagine you have ſomething to ſay to me." But he ſtill anſwered in the negative, and the duke rode home.

In a day or two after this tranſaction another letter was brought to him, containing the following addreſs; "My lord, you receive this as an acknowlegement of your punctuality, as to the time and place of meeting on Sunday laſt, though it was owing to you it anſwered no purpoſe. The pageantry of being armed, and the enſign of your order, were uſeleſs, and too conſpicuous. You needed no attendant; the place was not calculated for miſchief, nor was any intended. If you walk in the weſt iſle of Weſtminſter-abbey, towards eleven o'clock on Sunday next, your ſagacity will point out the perſon, whom you will addreſs, by aſking his company to take a turn or two with you. You will not fail, on enquiry, to be acquainted with the name and place of abode; according to which direction, you will pleaſe ſend two or three hundred pound bank notes the next day by the penny-poſt. Exert not your curioſity too early; it is in your power to make me grateful on certain terms. I have friends who are faithful; but they do not bark before they bite. I am, &c. F."

The duke, deſirous of unravelling this ſtrange myſtery, repaired to the Abbey at the time preſcribed; and after having walked up and down for five or ſix minutes, ſaw the very ſame perſon to whom he had ſpoke in Hyde-Park, enter the Abbey with another man of a creditable appearance. This laſt, after they had viewed ſome of the monuments, went into the choir; and the other turning back, advanced towards the duke, who accoſting him, aſked if he had any thing to ſay to him, or any commands for him? he replied, "No, my lord, I have not." "Sure you have," ſaid the duke; but he perſiſted in his denial. Then the duke leaving him, took ſeveral turns in the iſle, while the ſtranger walked on the other ſide. But nothing further paſſed between them; and although the duke had provided ſeveral perſons in diſguiſe to apprehend the delinquent, he forbore giving the ſignal, that, notwithſtanding appearances, he might run no riſque of injuring an innocent perſon.

Not long after this ſecond diſappointment, he received a third letter to the following effect: "My lord, I am fully convinced, that you had a companion on Sunday: I interpret it as owing to the weakneſs of human nature; but ſuch proceeding is far from being ingenuous, and may produce bad effects, whilſt it is impoſſible to anſwer the end propoſed. You will ſee me again ſoon, as it were by accident, and may eaſily find where I go to: in conſequence of which, by being ſent to I ſhall wait on your grace: but expect to be quite alone and to converſe in whiſpers: you will likewiſe give your honour, upon meeting, that no part of the converſation ſhall tranſpire. Theſe, and the former terms complied with, enſure your ſafety: my revenge, in caſe of non-compliance, (or any ſcheme to expoſe me) will be ſlower, but not the leſs ſure; and ſtrong ſuſpicion the utmoſt that can poſſibly enſue upon it, while the chances would be ten-fold againſt you. You will poſſibly be in doubt after the meeting, but it is quite neceſſary the outſide ſhould be a maſk to the in. The family of the † Bloods is not extinct, though they are not in my ſcheme."

The expreſſion, "you will ſee me again ſoon, as it were by acident," ſeemed evidently to point at the perſon to whom he had ſpoke in the Park and in the Abbey; nevertheleſs he ſaw him not again, nor did he hear any thing farther of the affair for two months; at the expiration of which the poſt brought him the following letter: "May it pleaſe your grace, I have reaſon to believe that the ſon of one Barnard, a ſurveyor in Abingdon-buildings, Weſtminſter, is acquainted with ſome ſecrets that nearly concern your ſafety; his father is now out of town, which will give you an opportunity of queſtioning him more privately; it would be uſeleſs to your grace, as well as dangerous to me, to appear more publicly in this affair. Your ſincere friend, Anonymous.---He frequently goes to Storey's Gate coffee-houſe."

About ten days after the receipt of this letter, the duke ſent a perſon to that coffee-houſe to enquire for Mr. Barnard, and tell him he would be glad to ſpeak to him. The meſſage was delivered to Mr. Barnard, who replied, he would wait on his grace next Thurſday, half an hour after ten in the morning. He faithfully kept his promiſe, and no ſooner appeared than the duke recognized him to be the perſon to whom he had ſpoke in the Park and the Abbey. Having led him into an apartment, and ſhut the door, he aſked, as before, if he had any thing to impart; and was anſwered, as formerly, in the negative. Then the duke repeated every circumſtance of this ſtrange tranſaction; to which Barnard liſtened with attention and ſurprize, yet without exhibiting any marks of conſcious guilt or confuſion.

* The name of the aſſaſſin who poignarded Villiers duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Charles I.

† Blood was the name of the ruffian who, in the reign of Charles II. endeavoured to aſſaſſinate the duke of Ormond, and to ſteal the crown and ſceptre from the Jewel-office in the Tower.

The duke obſerving, that it was matter of aſtoniſhment to ſee letters of ſuch import written with the correctneſs of a ſcholar, the other replied, that a man might be very poor and very learned at the ſame time. When he ſaw the fourth letter, in which his name was mentioned, with the circumſtance of his father's abſence, he ſaid, "It is very odd; my father was then out of town." This expreſſion ſeemed the more remarkable, as the letter was without date; and he could not, as an innocent man, be ſuppoſed to know at what time it was written. The duke having informed him of every particular, added, that it behoved him, even more than his grace himſelf, to detect the writer of the letters, eſpecially of the laſt, in which he was expreſsly named. To this admonition he returned no other anſwer but a ſmile, and then withdrew.

How theſe circumſtances came to the knowlege of the public does not appear; but, ſoon after, Mr. Barnard was taken into cuſtody, and tried at the Old Bailey, for ſending a threatening letter, contrary to the ſtatute. No evidence, however, could be produced to prove that the letters were of his hand-writing; nor could any preſumption be ſaid to lie againſt him, except his being in Hyde-Park and in Weſtminſter-Abbey, at the place and time appointed in the two firſt letters.

On the other hand, Mr. Barnard proved, that on the Sunday when he ſaw the duke in Hyde-Park, he was on his way to Kenſington on particular buſineſs, by his father's order, ſignified to him that very morning: that he accordingly went thither, and dined with his uncle, in company with ſeveral other perſons, to whom he related what had paſſed between the duke of Marlborough and him in the Park: that his being afterwards in Weſtminſter-Abbey was the effect of mere accident; that Mr. James Greenwood, his kinſman, a brewer at Deptford, who had lain the preceding night at his father's houſe, deſired him to dreſs himſelf, that they might walk together in the Park; and he did not comply with this requeſt till after much ſolicitation: that he propoſed to enter the Park without paſſing through the Abbey, but was prevailed on by Mr. Greenwood, who expreſſed a deſire of ſeeing the newly-erected monument of general Hargrave: that having formerly communicated to this friend the ſtrange circumſtance of the duke's ſpeaking to him in Hyde-Park, Mr. Greenwood no ſooner ſaw that nobleman in the Abbey than he gave notice to Mr. Barnard, who, as he was very ſhort-ſighted, did not ſee his grace; nor, if he had, could poſſibly have known him: that, from his paſſing them ſeveral times, Mr. Greenwood concluded the duke wanted to ſpeak with Mr. Barnard alone, and he therefore quitted him and retired into the choir, that they might have an opportunity of talking together privately. It likewiſe appeared, from undoubted evidence, that Barnard had often mentioned openly, to his friends and acquaintance, the circumſtances of what paſſed between him and the duke in the Park and in the Abbey: that his father was a man of unblemiſhed reputation, and in affluent circumſtances: that he himſelf was never reduced to any want, or ſuch exigence as might impel him to any deſperate methods of obtaining money: that his fidelity had been often tried, and his life always irreproachable. For theſe reaſons the jury were convinced of the priſoner's innocence, and he was therefore acquitted of the crime laid to his charge.

The fourth letter ſtill remains an inſcrutable myſtery. No one could imagine, from Mr. Barnard's behaviour, "that he was acquainted with ſome ſecrets that nearly concerned the duke's ſafety;" nor could it be conceived why any perſon, who might have heard of his grace's having received threatening letters, ſhould name that gentleman. The moſt natural conjecture, if on ſuch an occaſion a conjecture may be allowed, is, that ſome officious perſon, who might have received ſome ſlight intimation of the duke's buſineſs at the Abbey, and obſerved him ſpeak to Mr. Barnard, might have followed that gentleman home, and taking it for granted that if he ſhould, in conſequence of this information, be detected in any evil deſign, he (the informer) whenever he ſhould think proper to reveal himſelf, would be rewarded, might be induced to make the information at a venture, and in the mean time to remain incognito till the event ſhould be known. With reſpect to the duke, he appears to have acted through the whole of this intricate affair with the utmoſt generoſity and honour; to have undertaken the proſecution merely from public principles; and to have been more deſirous that the priſoner ſhould be found innocent than guilty.

In the month of Auguſt the king, in quality of elector of Hanover, having occaſion for two hundred thouſand pounds, a loan by ſubſcription for that ſum was opened at the Bank, and filled immediately by ſeven or eight money-dealers of London.

On the twenty-third day of November both houſes of parliament met at Weſtminſter, when, his majeſty being indiſpoſed, the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion, and the lord-keeper addreſſed them to the following effect: He told them, his majeſty had directed the lords of the commiſſion to aſſure his parliament, that he always received the higheſt ſatisfaction in being able to lay before them any events that might promote the honour and intereſt of his kingdoms: that, in conſequence of their advice, and enabled by the aſſiſtance which they unanimouſly gave, his majeſty had exerted his endeavours to carry on the war in the moſt vigorous manner, in order to attain that deſirable end, always to be wiſhed, a ſafe and honourable peace: that it had pleaſed the Divine Providence to bleſs his meaſures and arms with ſucceſs in ſeveral parts; and to make the enemies of the nation feel, that the ſtrength of Great Britain is not to be provoked with impunity: that the con-queſt of the ſtrong fortreſs of Louiſbourg, with the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John; the demolition of Frontenac, of the higheſt importance to his operations in America, and the reduction of Senegal, could not fail to bring great diſtreſs on the French commerce and colonies, and, in proportion, to procure great advantage to thoſe of Great Britain: that France had alſo been made ſenſible, that whilſt her forces were ſent forth to invade and ravage the dominions of her neighbours, her own coaſts were not inacceſſible to his majeſty's fleets and armies; a truth which ſhe had experienced in the demolition of the works at Cherburg, erected at a great expence, with a particular view to annoy England, as well as in the loſs of a great number of ſhips and veſſels; but that no treatment, however injurious to his majeſty, could tempt him to make retaliation on the innocent ſubjects of that crown: that in Germany his majeſty's good brother the king of Pruſſia, and prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, had found full employment for the armies of France and her confederates, from which the Engliſh operations, both by ſea and in America, had derived the moſt evident advantage; their ſucceſſes owing, under God, to their able conduct, and the bravery of his majeſty's troops and thoſe of his allies having been ſignal and glorious. The king, moreover, commanded them to declare, that the common cauſe of liberty and independency was ſtill making noble and glorious efforts againſt the unnatural union formed to oppreſs it: that the commerce of his ſubjects, the ſource of national riches, had, by the vigilant protection received from his majeſty's fleet, flouriſhed in a manner not to be paralleled during ſuch troubles. In this ſtate of things, he ſaid, the king in his wiſdom thought it unneceſſary to uſe many words to perſuade them to bear up againſt all difficulties, effectually to ſtand by and defend his majeſty, vigorouſly to ſupport the king of Pruſſia and the reſt of his majeſty's allies, and to exert themſelves to reduce their enemies to equitable terms of accommodation. He obſerved to the houſe of commons, that the uncommon extent of this war, in different parts, occaſioned it to be uncommonly expenſive: that the king had ordered them to declare to the commons, that he ſincerely lamented, and deeply felt for the burdens of his people: that the ſeveral eſtimates were ordered to be laid before them; and that he deſired only ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be requiſite to puſh the war with advantage, and be adequate to the neceſſary ſervices. In the laſt place, he aſſured them the king took ſo much ſatisfaction in that good harmony which ſubſiſted among his faithful ſubjects, that it was more proper for him now to thank them for it than to repeat his exhortations to it: that this union, neceſſary at all times, was more eſpecially ſo in ſuch critical conjunctures; and his majeſty doubted not but the good effects the nation had found from it would be the ſtrongeſt motive to induce them to purſue it.

This ſpeech was anſwered by loyal and affectionate addreſſes from both houſes of parliament, who ſeemed fully ſatisfied with the conduct of the miniſtry. That of the lords was conceived in the following terms:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, beg leave to approach your throne with hearts full of that duty and affection to your ſacred perſon and government which become the moſt faithful ſubjects to the beſt of kings. That conſtant regard and attention which your majeſty has ſhewn to the honour and intereſt of your kingdoms, have filled our minds with the moſt grateful ſentiments; and we ſee with real ſatisfaction thoſe active and vigilant efforts which your majeſty, in your great wiſdom, has made to carry on the war with vigour, in order to the deſirable end which we all wiſh, a ſafe and honourable peace. Juſtice and good policy required that our enemies ſhould feel how dangerous it is for them to provoke the ſpirit and ſtrength of the Britiſh nation.

"We acknowlege, with becoming thankfulneſs, the goodneſs of the Divine Providence, in having crowned your majeſty's meaſures and arms with ſucceſs in ſeveral parts; and we joyfully congratulate your majeſty on the conqueſt of the ſtrong fortreſs of Louiſbourg, with the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John, the taking of Frontenac, and the reduction of Senegal. The high importance of theſe ſucceſſes is apparent, in the reputation thereby acquired to your majeſty's arms, and in the diſtreſs they cannot fail to bring upon the French commerce and colonies, as well as in the happy effects procured to thoſe of Great Britain. We have ſeen, with the warmeſt emotions of reſentment, the exorbitant devaſtations committed by the armies of France upon the dominions of your majeſty, and thoſe of your allies in Germany. They muſt now have experienced how much, in conſequence of their unbounded ambition to invade their neighbours, their own coaſts are expoſed in the demolition of their expenſive works at Cherbourg, particularly intended for the annoyance of this country; and in the loſs of ſo many ſhips and veſſels, as well privateers as others, in their ports.

"At the ſame time, we cannot ſufficiently admire your majeſty's magnanimity and moderation, in not having hitherto retaliated on the innocent ſubjects of that crown the injurious treatment which you have received. We have a juſt ſenſe of the real advantages derived to the operations of Great Britain in particular, as well as to the common cauſe in general, from the wiſe conduct of the king of Pruſſia and prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic. Their great abilities, and the bravery of your majeſty's troops, and thoſe of your majeſty's allies, have been ſignally conſpicuous in the ſucceſſes with which they have been attended, and muſt be acknowleged by all Europe. Nothing can poſſibly be of greater national importance than the navigation and commerce of your ſubjects; and we return your majeſty our dutiful thanks for that protection and ſecurity which they have received from your royal care in the diſpoſition of your fleet, to which their preſent flouriſhing condition is ſo much owing. The ſtagnation of our enemy's trade, and the taking and deſtroying ſo many of their capital ſhips of war, ought, in this view, to be reckoned amongſt the moſt happy events.

"Permit us to declare our grateful ſenſe of that paternal tenderneſs which your majeſty has expreſſed for the burthens of your people: we receive from thence the ſtrongeſt encouragement to adhere the more firmly to the cauſe of the proteſtant religion and public liberty, againſt any unnatural union formed to oppreſs it. In this juſt cauſe we will, to our utmoſt, effectually ſtand by and defend your majeſty, ſupport the king of Pruſſia and the reſt of your allies, and vigorouſly exert ourſelves to reduce our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation. Our duty and fidelity to your majeſty, and our zeal for the proteſtant ſucceſſion in your royal family, are uniform and unalterable: our prayers for the prolongation of your precious life and auſpicious reign over us, are ſincere and fervent; and we beg leave to give your majeſty the ſtrongeſt aſſurances, that nothing ſhall be wanting on our part to improve union and good harmony amongſt all your ſubjects, for promoting and ſecuring theſe intereſting and eſſential objects."

The addreſs of the commons, which was no leſs loyal, proceeded in the following ſtrain:

"We your moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Great Britain in parliament aſſembled, return your majeſty our moſt ſincere and hearty thanks for the ſpeech delivered, by your majeſty's command, to both houſes of parliament.

"We beg leave to congratulate your majeſty, with hearts full of the moſt unfeigned joy, upon the many ſignal ſucceſſes with which it has pleaſed Divine Providence to bleſs your majeſty's meaſures and arms in ſeveral parts of the world; particularly, in the important conqueſt of the ſtrong fortreſs of Louiſbourg, with the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John; the taking of Frontenac, ſo eſſential to our operations in North America; the reduction of the valuable ſettlement of Senegal; the total demolition of the harbour and works of Cherbourg, erected at ſo great expence by the enemy, with a particular view to annoy this country; and the deſtruction of the ſhipping and privateers in the ports of France.

"Your majeſty's faithful commons feel, with the higheſt ſatisfaction, how greatly theſe events redound to the honour and intereſts of your majeſty's kingdoms, to the upholding the reputation of the Britiſh arms, and to the maintaining and extending the glories of your majeſty's reign.

"We have the moſt lively ſenſe of theſe happy conſequences (under God) of your majeſty's wiſdom in the powerful exertion of the naval force of theſe kingdoms, to the annoyance and diſtreſs of the fleets, trade, and navigation of France, whilſt the commerce of Great Britain flouriſhes in full protection and ſecurity; and, at the ſame time, of your majeſty's juſtice and magnanimity, in ſteadily ſupporting your allies, and in carrying on with vigour, in all parts, this arduous and neceſſary war.

"It is with joy and admiration we ſee the glorious efforts made in Germany by your majeſty's great ally the king of Pruſſia, and thoſe made by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, ſeconded by the valour of your majeſty's troops and thoſe of your allies; and that full employment has thereby been given to all the armies of France and of her confederates; from which our operations, both by ſea and in America, have received the moſt evident and important advantages.

"Permit us to aſſure your majeſty, that your faithful commons, juſtly animated in defence of the rights of your majeſty's crown and of the proteſtant religion, and the common cauſe of liberty and independency, againſt the dangerous union which hath been formed to oppreſs them, will bear up againſt all difficulties, and exert themſelves to the utmoſt, by granting to your majeſty ſuch ſupplies as ſhall be neceſſary, effectually to ſtand by and defend your majeſty, and vigorouſly to ſupport the king of Pruſſia, and the reſt of your majeſty's allies, firmly relying on the wiſdom and goodneſs of your majeſty, that the ſame will be applied, in the propereſt manner, to puſh the war with advantage, and to reduce the enemy to equitable terms of a ſafe, honourable, and laſting peace.

"We beg leave alſo to expreſs our moſt grateful ſenſe of the paternal ſatisfaction your majeſty takes in that good harmony which ſubſiſts amongſt your faithful ſubjects, and of your majeſty's gracious acceptance of the univerſal zeal and affection of your people; which ſalutary union hath enabled us ſo effectually to exert our ſtrength abroad, and hath preſerved at home tranquillity, ſafety, and public credit; and we truſt that the continuance of the ſame truly national ſpirit will, by the bleſſing of God, be attended with the like happy effects for the future."

The miniſtry, encouraged by this approbation of their conduct, reſolved to proſecute the war in every quarter, and particularly to ſupport the king of Pruſſia with ſtill greater vigour than ever. With this view, on the ſeventh day of December a new treaty was concluded at London between that prince and the Britiſh nation, importing, that as the burthens of war in which the king of Pruſſia was engaged, laid him under the neceſſity of making freſh efforts to defend himſelf againſt the multitude of enemies who had attacked his dominions, he was obliged to take new meaſures with the king of England for their reciprocal defence and ſafety; and as his Britannic majeſty had at the ſame time ſignified his earneſt deſire to ſtrengthen the friendſhip ſubſiſting between the two courts, and in conſequence thereof to conclude a formal convention for granting to his Pruſſian majeſty ſpeedy and powerful aſſiſtance, their majeſties had nominated and authoriſed their miniſters to concert and ſettle the following articles:

All former treaties between the two crowns, particularly that ſigned at Weſtminſter on the ſixteenth of January, in the year 1756, and the convention of the eleventh of April, in the year 1758, are confirmed by the preſent convention in their whole tenor, as if they were herein inſerted word for word. The king of Great Britain ſhall cauſe to be paid at London, to ſuch perſon or perſons as ſhall be authoriſed by the king of Pruſſia for that end the ſum of four millions of rixdollars, making ſix hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds ſterling, at one payment, immediately on the exchange of the ratifications, if the king of Pruſſia ſhall ſo require. His Pruſſian majeſty ſhall employ the ſaid ſum in ſupporting and augmenting his forces, which ſhall act in ſuch a manner as ſhall be of the greateſt ſervice to the common cauſe, and contribute moſt to the mutual defence and ſafety of their ſaid majeſties. The king of Great Britain, both as king and elector, and the king of Pruſſia, reciprocally bind themſelves not to conclude, with the powers that have taken part in the preſent war, any treaty of peace, truce, or other ſuch like convention, but by common advice and conſent, each expreſly including therein the other. The ratifications of the preſent convention ſhall be exchanged within ſix weeks, or ſooner, if poſſible.

The addreſſes of thanks were no ſooner preſented by both houſes of parliament, than the commons proceeded to ſettle the ſupply. For this purpoſe two committees were forthwith eſtabliſhed, and continued by adjournments to the month of May, by the twenty third day of which all their reſolutions were finiſhed. They voted ſixty thouſand ſeamen, including fourteen thouſand eight hundred and forty-five marines, for the ſervice of the enſuing year; and for the operations by land, a body of troops amounting to fifty-three thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy-ſeven effective men, including four thouſand and eight invalids, beſides the auxiliaries of Hanover, Heſſe, Brunſwic, Sax-Gotha, and Buckebourg, to the number of fifty thouſand, and four battalions on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, in actual ſervice in America and Africa. For the maintenance of the ſixty thouſand men employed in the ſea-ſervice, they granted three millions one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds; for the land forces, one million two hundred fifty-ſix thouſand one hundred and thirty pounds fifteen ſhillings and two pence; for the charge of the additional four battalions, forty thouſand eight hundred and ſeventy nine pounds thirteen ſhillings and nine-pence; for the pay of the general and ſtaff officers, and hoſpitals of the land forces, fifty-two thouſand four hundred and eighty-four pounds one ſhilling and eight pence; for maintaining the garriſons in the plantations, Gibraltar, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Providence, Cape Breton, and Senegal, the ſum of ſeven hundred and forty-two thouſand five hundred and thirty-one pounds five ſhillings and ſeven pence; for the charge of ordnance for the land ſervice, two hundred and twenty thouſand ſeven hundred and eighty-nine pounds eleven ſhillings and nine pence; for extraordinary ſervice performed by the ſame office, and not provided for by parliament in the courſe of the preceding year, three hundred twenty-three thouſand nine hundred and eighty-ſeven pounds thirteen ſhillings and three-pence; for the ordinary of the navy, including half-pay to ſea-officers, two hundred and thirty eight thouſand four hundred and ninety-one pounds nine ſhillings and eight pence; towards the ſupport of Greenwich hoſpital, and for the out-penſioners of Chelſea-college, the ſum of thirty-ſix thouſand pounds.

They allotted for one year's expence, incurred by the foreign troops in the pay of Great-Britain, one million two hundred thirty-eight thouſand one hundred and ſeventy-ſeven pounds nineteen ſhillings and ten pence, over and above ſixty thouſand pounds, for enabling his majeſty to fulfil his engagements with the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, purſuant to the ſeparate article of a new treaty concluded between them in the month of January of this current year, ſtipulating that this ſum ſhould be paid to his ſerene highneſs, in order to facilitate the means by which he might again fix his reſidence in his own dominions, and by his preſence give freſh courage to his faithful ſubjects. Eighty thouſand pounds were granted for enabling his majeſty to diſcharge the like ſum, raiſed in purſuance of an act paſſed in the preceding ſeſſion, and charged upon the firſt aids or ſupplies to be granted in this ſeſſion of parliament. The ſum of two hundred thouſand pounds was voted towards the building and repairing ſhips of war for the enſuing year. Fifteen thouſand pounds were allowed for improving London-bridge; and forty thouſand on account for the Foundling hoſpital. For the charge of tranſports to be employed in the courſe of the year, they aſſigned ſix hundred ſixty-ſeven thouſand ſeven hundred and twenty-one pounds nineteen ſhillings and ſeven pence: for maintaining the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia, they beſtowed twenty-five thouſand two hundred and thirty-eight pounds thirteen ſhillings and five pence. To replace ſums taken from the ſinking fund, thirty-three thouſand two hundred and fifty-two pounds eighteen ſhillings and ten pence half-penny; for maintaining the Britiſh forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa, ten thouſand pounds; and for paying off the mortgage on an eſtate, deviſed for the endowment of a profeſſorſhip in the univerſity of Cambridge, the ſum of twelve hundred and eighty pounds.

For the expence of the militia they voted ninety thouſand pounds: for extraordinary expences relating to the land forces, incurred in the courſe of laſt year, and unprovided for by parliament, the ſum of four hundred ſixty-ſix thouſand ſeven hundred and eighty-five pounds ten ſhillings five pence and three farthings. For the purchaſe of certain lands and hereditaments, in order to ſecure the king's docks at Portſmouth, Chatham, and Plymouth, they granted thirty-ſix thouſand nine hundred and ſixty-ſix pounds two ſhillings and ten pence. They voted two hundred thouſand pounds for enabling his majeſty to give proper compenſations to the reſpective provinces in North America, for the expences they had incurred in levying and maintaining troops for the ſervice of the public. They granted twenty thouſand pounds to the Eaſt India company, towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their ſettlements; and half that ſum was granted for carrying on the fortifications to ſecure the harbour of Milford. To make good ſeveral ſums iſſued by his majeſty, for indemnifying the innholders and victuallers of Hampſhire, for the expences they had incurred by quartering the Heſſian auxiliaries in England; for an addition to the ſalaries of judges, and other leſs conſiderable purpoſes, they allowed the ſum of twenty-ſix thouſand one hundred and ſeventy-eight pounds ſixteen ſhillings and ſix pence. Finally, they voted one million, upon account, for enabling the king to defray any extraordinary expence of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the ſervice of the current year; and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to diſappoint or defeat any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs ſhould require.

The ſum of all the grants voted by the committee of ſupply, amounted to twelve millions ſeven hundred ſixty-one thouſand three hundred and ten pounds nineteen ſhillings and five-pence.

The funds allotted for raiſing this ſupply, conſiſted of the land tax at four ſhillings in the pound, the malt tax continued, and the following expedients. They reſolved, that the annuities at three per centum, amounting to three millions one hundred thouſand pounds, granted in the year 1757, ſhould be, with the conſent of the ſeveral proprietors, added to the joint-ſtock of three per centum transferable annuities at the bank of England, conſolidated by the acts paſſed in the twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth years of his majeſty's reign, and the charges and expences thereof to be charged upon the ſinking-fund until redemption by parliament; and that all ſuch perſons as ſhould not, before the fifth of April next, ſignify their diſſent, in books to be opened at the Bank for that purpoſe, ſhould be deemed aſſenting to this propoſal. They further reſolved, that all the moneys, which might ariſe, after the fifth day of January, from the produce of the additional ſtamp-duties on pamphlets, printed papers, coals exported, the ſurplus of the new duty on licences for retailing wine and ſpirituous liquors, which were conſtituted a fund for paying three per cent. per annum at the Bank, on three millions borrowed, by virtue of an act paſſed in the thirtieth year of his majeſty's reign, towards the ſupply of the year 1757; as alſo the annuities on ſingle lives, payable at the receipt of the Exchequer, in reſpect of the ſame, ſhould be added to the ſinking-fund.

They reſolved, that ſix millions ſix hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be raiſed by transferable annuities, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum; and that an additional capital of fifteen pounds ſhould be added to every hundred pounds advanced; which additional capital ſhould conſiſt of ten pounds, given in a lottery-ticket to each ſubſcriber, and of five pounds in like transferable annuities at three pounds per cent: the blanks and prizes of the lottery to be attended with like annuities, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum, to commence from the fifth day of January, in the year 1760: that the ſum of ſix millions ſix hundred thouſand pounds, together with the ſaid additional capital of five pounds per cent, amounting to three hundred and thirty thouſand pounds, making in the whole ſix millions nine hundred and thirty thouſand pounds, ſhould bear intereſt after the rate of three per cent, to commence on the fifth day of July next enſuing: that theſe annuities ſhould be transferable at the bank of England, and charged upon a fund eſtabliſhed for that purpoſe in this ſeſſion of parliament, for which the ſinking-fund ſhould be a collateral ſecurity, redeemable by parliament in the whole, or in part, by ſums not leſs than five hundred thouſand pounds at one time, ſix months notice having been firſt given of ſuch payments reſpectively: that the lottery ſhould conſiſt of tickets valued at ten pounds each, in a proportion not exceeding eight blanks to a prize, each blank to be valued at ſix pounds. They reſolved, that every ſubſcriber ſhould, on or before the thirteenth day of February, make a depoſit of fifteen per centum, on ſuch ſum as he ſhould chuſe to ſubſcribe towards raiſing the ſix millions ſix hundred thouſand pounds, with the caſhiers of the bank of England, as a ſecurity for his making the future payments on or before the times limited by the act: that the ſeveral ſums ſo received ſhould by the caſhiers, be payed into the receipt of his majeſty's Exchequer, to be applied from time to time, to ſuch ſervices as the Commons ſhould then have voted, and not for any other purpoſe: that any ſubſcriber, paying the whole, or any part of his ſubſcription, previous to the days appointed for the reſpective payments, ſhould be allowed a diſcount, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum, from the days of ſuch reſpective payments to the times preſcribed.

They reſolved, that a ſubſidy of one ſhilling in the pound ſhould be impoſed on all tobacco, foreign linens, ſugar, and other grocery, Eaſt-India commodities, foreign brandy, ſpirits, and paper imported into Great-Britain, according to the value ſettled on each commodity by the ſeveral books of rates, on any acts of parliament, over and above the preſent duties charged upon theſe articles. They laid an additional inland duty of one ſhilling per pound upon all coffee ſold in Great-Britain, by wholeſale or retail; and another of ninepence per pound upon chocolate, over and above the former inland duty, and all cuſtoms payed on its importation. They reſolved, that ſuch part of the hundred thouſand pounds, granted in the laſt ſeſſion, towards defraying the expence of the militia, as remained in the Exchequer, after ſatisfaction of that expence, ſhould be iſſued and applied towards raiſing the ſupply granted in this ſeſſion: that, after the fifth day of July, in the current year, any perſon might trade in any goods or wares, in which the quantity of gold, in any one ſeparate piece, ſhould not exceed two penny weights, or the quantity of ſilver be under five penny weights, without being liable to take out a licence for that purpoſe; but that, from the ſame date, every perſon ſelling gold or ſilver plate, or goods in which gold or ſilver is manufactured, and the quantity of gold in one diſtinct piece ſhould amount to two ounces or upwards, ſhould pay five pounds for an annual licence, inſtead of the forty ſhillings formerly payable for this purpoſe; and that all pawn-brokers, refiners, and others, trading in gold and ſilver plate, ſhould be obliged to take out this new annual licence; the ſums thus raiſed to be applied to the ſame uſes and purpoſes, to which the ſums charged on licences by an act of laſt ſeſſion were applicable.

They ordained, that the act to ſettle the trade to Africa, paſſed in the reign of William the third, for allowing during a limited time, a drawback of the duties upon the exportation of copper bars imported, with a proviſo continued by ſeveral ſucceſſive acts, and now near expiring, ſhould be further protracted: that ſo much of an act, paſſed in the eighth year of George the firſt, for encouraging the ſilk manufacture of the kingdom, as relates to this encouragement, and to taking off ſeveral duties on merchandize exported, ſhould likewiſe be continued. They moreover voted the continuation of ſo much of an act paſſed in the ſecond year of George the ſecond, for the better preſervation of his majeſty's woods in America, as related to the premium upon maſts, yards, and bowſprits, tar, pitch, and turpentine. They reſolved, that the act for encouraging the growth of coffee in the American plantations, and another for the more effectual ſecuring the duties on foreign made ſail-cloth imported into the kingdom, ſhould be continued. They determined, that the ſums remaining in the receipt of exchequer, diſpoſable by parliament, amounting to the ſum of two hundred fifty-three thouſand three hundred and eighty-four pounds and eleven pence, ſhould be applied towards making good the ſupply granted in this ſeſſion. They reſolved, that the duties payable upon raw ſhort ſilk or capiton, and ſilk nubs or huſks, ſhould, after the fifth day of July, ceaſe and determine; but, in lieu thereof, that the ſame duties ſhould be payed upon the importation of theſe articles, as were payed upon raw long ſilk imported, and applied to the ſame purpoſes.

Towards the preſent ſupply they likewiſe granted the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds, repayed into the receipt of the Exchequer, being the ſum which was voted in the year 1755, for enabling the king to fulfil his engagements with the empreſs of Ruſſia. For defraying the expence incurred by the additional ſalaries granted to the judges, they impoſed an additional ſtamp-duty of ſixpence upon every piece of vellum or parchment, or ſheet or piece of paper, on which ſhould be engroſſed or written any affidavit uſed at any court of law or equity at Weſtminſter, or in the courts of the great ſeſſions in Wales, or county-palatine of Cheſter, except affidavits taken purſuant to ſeveral acts made in the 30th and 32d years of the reign of Charles II. for burying in woollen; and except ſuch affidavits as ſhould be taken before the officers of the cuſtoms, or any juſtice of the peace, or commiſſioners appointed by act of parliament for aſſeſſing or levying aids or duties granted to his majeſty, which affidavits ſhould be taken by the ſaid officers of the cuſtoms, juſtices, or commiſſioners, by virtue of their authority, as juſtices of the peace, or commiſſioners, reſpectively. This additional ſtamp-duty was charged on all affidavits read and filed in the aforeſaid courts of judicature; on all paper and vellum uſed for common bail, rules, or orders, copies of rules or orders, original writs, ſubpœnas, proceſs or mandate that ſhould iſſue from or paſs the ſeals of any of the courts of Weſtminſter, courts of the great ſeſſions in Wales, courts in the counties palatine, or any other court whatever holding plea, where the debt or damage amounts to forty ſhillings or above, or the thing demanded is of that value; excepting, however, writs of covenant for levying fines, writs of entry for ſuffering common recoveries, and writs of habeas corpus.

They moreover eſtabliſhed an additional ſtamp-duty of one penny upon every ſheet of paper or piece of vellum uſed for depoſitions taken in the court of Chancery, or other court of equity at Weſtminſter, (except the paper draughts of depoſitions taken by virtue of any commiſſion before they are engroſſed) for copies of bills, anſwers, pleas, demurrers, replications, rejoinders, interrogatories, depoſitions, or other proceedings whatſoever, in this or any other court of judicature in England or Wales. The augmentation of ſalaries granted to the judges in Scotland was charged upon the duties and revenues collected in that part of Great Britain.

Finally the commons reſolved, that the ſum of two millions two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſhould be iſſued out of the ſinking-fund towards the ſupply of the current year; and one million raiſed by exchequer bills, chargeable on the firſt aids to be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament. Theſe reſolutions were immediately digeſted into bills, which, ſoon after, received the royal ſanction.

On the twenty-ſecond day of May, Mr. ſecretary Pitt delivered a meſſage from his majeſty, importing, that his majeſty, relying on the experienced zeal and affection of his faithful commons, and conſidering that, in this critical conjuncture, emergences might ariſe, which might be of the utmoſt importance, and be attended with the moſt pernicious conſequences, if proper means ſhould not immediately be applied to prevent or defeat them, was deſirous that this houſe would enable him to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the ſervice of the year 1759, and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to diſappoint or defeat any enterprizes or deſigns of his enemies, and as the exigencies of affairs might require.

This meſſage was no ſooner read, than a motion was made, and unanimouſly approved, that it ſhould be referred to the committee, who forthwith formed upon it the reſolution, whereby one million was granted, to be raiſed by loans, or exchequer bills, chargeable on the firſt aids that ſhould be given in the next ſeſſion. This produced a bill enabling his majeſty to raiſe the ſum of one million, for the uſes and purpoſes therein mentioned, comprehending a clauſe, allowing the bank of England to advance, on the credit of the loan therein mentioned, any ſum not exceeding a million, notwithſtanding the act of the fifth and ſixth years in the reign of William and Mary, by which the bank was eſtabliſhed.

The bills relating ſolely to the ſupply being finally eſtabliſhed, the houſe proceeded, as uſual, to enact other laws for the benefit of the public. Petitions having been preſented by the cities of Briſtol and New Sarum, alledging, that, ſince the laws prohibiting the making of low wines and ſpirits from grain, meal, and flour, had been in force, the commonalty appeared more ſober, healthy, and induſtrious; repreſenting the ill conſequences which they apprehended would attend the repeal of theſe laws, and therefore praying their continuance; a committee of the whole houſe reſolved, that the prohibition to export corn ſhould be continued to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year 1759; ſubject, nevertheleſs, to ſuch proviſions for ſhortening the ſaid term of its continuance as ſhould hereafter be made by any act of that ſeſſion, or by his majeſty with the advice of his privy council, during the receſs of parliament: that the act for diſcontinuing the duties upon corn and flour imported, or brought in as prize, was not proper to be further continued: and that the prohibition to make low wines or ſpirits from any ſort of grain, meal, or flour, ſhould be continued to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year 1759.

Before a bill was framed on theſe reſolutions, a remonſtrance was preſented by a great number of the malt-diſtillers of the city and ſuburbs of London, as well as by ſeveral farmers in the county of Norfolk, complaining of the hardſhips and loſſes they muſt ſuſtain, ſhould the bill paſs into a law.

However,

However, notwithſtanding their remonſtrances were carefully examined, the bill paſſed, with the amendments.

Repeated complaints having been made to the government by neutral nations, eſpecially the Dutch, that their ſhips had been plundered, and their crews maltreated, by ſome of the Engliſh privateers, the legiſlature reſolved to provide effectually againſt any ſuch outrageous practices for the future; and with this view the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, for amending and explaining an act of the twenty-ninth year of his preſent majeſty's reign, entitled, An act for the encouragement of ſeamen, and more ſpeedy and effectual manning of his majeſty's navy; which ſoon after received the royal aſſent, and contained the following regulations: That, after the firſt day of January in the preſent year, no commiſſion ſhould be granted to a privateer in Europe under the burden of one hundred tons, the force of ten carriage guns, being three pounders or above, with forty men at the leaſt, unleſs the lords of the admiralty, or perſons authoriſed by them, ſhould think fit to grant the ſame to any ſhip of inferior force or burthen, the owners thereof giving ſuch bail or ſecurity as ſhould be preſcribed: that the lords of the admiralty might at any time revoke, by an order in writing under their hands, any commiſſion granted to a privateer; this revocation being ſubject to an appeal to his majeſty in council, whoſe determination ſhould be final: that, previous to the granting any commiſſion, the perſons propoſing to be bound and give ſecurity ſhould ſeverally make oath of their being reſpectively worth more money than the ſum for which they were then to be bound, over and above the payment of all their juſt debts: that perſons applying for ſuch commiſſions ſhould make application in writing, and therein ſet forth a particular and exact deſcription of the veſſel, ſpecifying the burthen, and the number and nature of the guns on board, to what place belonging, as well as the name or names of the principal owner or owners, and the number of men; theſe particulars to be inſerted in the commiſſion, and every commander to produce ſuch commiſſion to the cuſtom-houſe officer, who ſhould examine the veſſel, and, finding her anſwer the deſcription, give a certificate thereof gratis, to be deemed a neceſſary clearance, without which the commander ſhould not depart: that if, after the firſt day of June, any captain of a privateer ſhould agree for the ranſom of any neutral veſſel, or the cargo, or any part thereof, after it ſhould have been taken as prize, and in purſuance of ſuch agreement ſhould actually diſcharge ſuch prize, he ſhould be deemed guilty of piracy; but that, with reſpect to contraband merchandize, he might take it on board his own ſhip, with the conſent of the commander of the neutral veſſel, and then ſet her at liberty; and that no perſon ſhould purloin or embezzle the ſaid merchandize before condemnation: that no judge or other perſon belonging to any court of admiralty ſhould be concerned in any privateer: that owners of veſſels, not being under fifty, or above one hundred tons, ſhould, after their commiſſions were declared void, be indemnified for their loſs by the public: that a court of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery, for the trial of offences committed within the juriſdiction of the admiralty, ſhould be held twice a-year in the Old Bailey at London, or in ſuch other place within England as the board of admiralty ſhould appoint: that the judge of any court of admiralty, after an appeal interpoſed, as well as before, ſhould, at the requeſt of the captor or claimant, iſſue an order for appraiſing the capture, when the parties could not agree upon the value, and an inventory to be taken; then exact ſecurity for the full value, and cauſe the capture to be delivered to the perſon giving ſuch ſecurity: but ſhould objection be made to the taking ſuch ſecurity, the judge ſhould, at the requeſt of either party, order ſuch merchandize to be entered, landed, and ſold at public auction, and the produce be depoſited at the Bank, or in ſome public ſecurities; and in caſe of ſecurity being given, the judge ſhould grant a paſs in favour of the capture; and finally, that this act ſhould remain in force only during the continuance of the preſent war with France.

From this regulation it is evident, that whatever outrages might have been offered to the ſhips of neutral nations, they were by no means encouraged by the legiſlature, or the body of the people.

The attention of the commons was next engaged by an object of no leſs importance to the public. This was the regular eſtabliſhment of the militia, which, notwithſtanding the endeavours of the legiſlature, was found ſtill incomplete, and in want of further aſſiſtance from the government. His majeſty having, by the chancellor of the Exchequer, recommended to the houſe the making ſuitable proviſion for defraying the charges of the militia during the current year, the accounts of the expence already incurred by this eſtabliſhment were laid before the committee of ſupply, who, after having duly examined them, reſolved, that ninety thouſand pounds ſhould be granted on account, towards providing pay and cloathing for the militia, from the laſt day of the laſt year to the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year 1760, and for refunding to the king a ſum advanced for this ſervice.

Leave was given to bring in one bill agreeable to this reſolution, and another to enforce the execution of the laws relating to the militia, remove certain difficulties, and prevent the inconveniencies with which it might be attended. So eager were the majority in both houſes for accompliſhing this national meaſure, that they not only carried both bills to the throne, where they received the royal ſanction; but they preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring his majeſty would give directions to his lieutenants of the ſeveral counties, ridings, and places in England, to uſe their utmoſt diligence and attention for carrying into execution the ſeveral acts of parliament relating to the militia.

The mutiny-bill, and that for the regulation of the marine forces while on ſhore, paſſed through the uſual forms, as annual meaſures, without any diſpute or oppoſition.

A committee having been appointed to enquire what laws were expired, or near expiring, and to report their opinion to the houſe touching the revival or continuation of theſe laws, they agreed to ſeveral reſolutions; in conſequence of which the following bills were brought in, and enacted into into laws, namely, an act for regulating the laſtage and ballaſtage of the river Thames; an act for continuing the law relating to the puniſhment of perſons going armed or diſguiſed; an act for continuing ſeveral laws near expiring; an act concerning the admeaſurement of coals; and an act for the relief of debtors, with reſpect to the impriſonment of their perſons. This laſt, among other particulars, ordained, that where more creditors than one ſhall charge any priſoner in execution, and deſire to have him detained in priſon, they ſhall only reſpectively pay him each ſuch weekly ſum, not exceeding one ſhilling and ſix-pence a-week, as the court, at the time of his being remanded, ſhall direct: and that if any priſoner, deſcribed by the act, ſhall remain in priſon three months after being committed, any creditor may compel him to give into court, upon oath, an account of his real and perſonal eſtate, to be diſpoſed of for the benefit of his creditors, they conſenting to his being diſcharged.

In the courſe of this ſeſſion a bill was paſſed, permitting the free importation of cattle from Ireland for a limited time; as was alſo an act allowing the free importation of tallow from that kingdom, for the term of five years.

In the month of February the commons preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, requeſting that he would give directions for laying before the houſe an account of what had been done, ſince the beginning of laſt year, towards ſecuring the harbour of Milford, in purſuance of any directions from his majeſty. Theſe accounts being examined, and the king having, by the chancellor of the Exchequer, exhorted them to make proviſion for fortifying the ſaid harbour, a bill was brought in to explain, amend, and render more effectual, the act of the laſt ſeſſion relating to this ſubject; and paſſing through both houſes, received the royal aſſent without oppoſition. By this act ſeveral engineers were added to the commiſſioners formerly appointed; and it was ordained, that fortifications ſhould be erected at Peter-church point, Weſtlanyon-point, and Neyland-point, as being the moſt proper and beſt ſituated places for fortifying the interior parts of the harbour. It was alſo enacted, that the commiſſioners ſhould appoint proper ſecretaries, clerks, aſſiſtants, and other officers, for carrying the two acts into execution; and that an account of the application of the money ſhould be laid before the parliament within twenty days of the opening of every ſeſſion.

The next object that engaged the attention of the commons was an affair of a very delicate nature, of the utmoſt importance to the commerce of the kingdom, and which equally affected the intereſt of the nation and the character of the natives. In the latter end of February complaint was made to the houſe, that, ſince the commencement of the war, an infamous traffic had been ſet on foot by ſome merchants of London, of importing French cloths into ſeveral ports of the Levant, on account of Britiſh ſubjects. Five perſons were ordered to attend the houſe; and the fact was clearly proved, not only by their evidence, but alſo by ſome papers delivered to the houſe by the Turkey company. A bill was immediately framed for putting a ſtop to this ſcandalous practice, declaring in the preamble, that ſuch traffic was not only a manifeſt diſcouragement and prejudice to the woollen manufactures of Great Britain, but alſo an advantage to the enemy; in conſequence of which they were enabled to maintain the war againſt theſe kingdoms. This act, however, was only to continue in force during the preſent war with France.

The commons then proceeded to explain and amend a law made in the laſt ſeſſion, for granting to his majeſty ſeveral rates and duties upon offices and penſions. The directions given in the former act for levying this impoſition having been found inconvenient in many reſpects, new regulations were now eſtabliſhed, importing, that thoſe deductions ſhould be paid into the hands of receivers appointed by the king for that purpoſe: that all ſums deducted under this act ſhould be accounted for to ſuch receivers, and the accounts audited and paſſed by them, and not by the auditors of the impreſts or the Exchequer: that all diſputes relating to the collection of this duty ſhould be finally, and in a ſummary way, determined by the barons of the Exchequer in England and Scotland reſpectively: that the commiſſioners of the land-tax ſhould fix and aſcertain the ſum total or amount of the perquiſites of every office and employment within their reſpective diſtricts, diſtinct from the ſalary thereunto belonging, to be deducted under the ſaid act, independently of any former valuation or aſſeſſment of the ſame to the land-tax; and ſhould rate or aſſeſs all offices and employments whereof the perquiſites ſhould be found to exceed the ſum of one hundred pounds per annum, at one ſhilling for every twenty thence ariſing: that the receivers ſhould tranſmit to the commiſſioners in every diſtrict where any office or employment is to be aſſeſſed, an account of ſuch offices and employments, that, upon being certified of the truth of their amount, they might be rated and aſſeſſed accordingly: that, in all future aſſeſſments of the land-tax, the ſaid offices and employments ſhould not be valued at higher rates than thoſe at which they were aſſeſſed towards the land-tax of the thirty-firſt year of the preſent reign: that the word perquiſite ſhould be underſtood to mean ſuch profits of offices and employments as ariſe from fees eſtabliſhed by cuſtom or authority, and payable either by the crown or the ſubjects, in conſideration of buſineſs done in the courſe of executing ſuch offices and employments: and that a commiſſioner poſſeſſed of any office or employment might not interfere in the execution of the ſaid act, except in what might relate to his own employment. By the four laſt clauſes ſeveral ſalaries are exempted from the payment of this duty.

Nothing ſurely could be more reaſonable than ſuch a law, by which thoſe who receive ſo much from the bounty of the government were obliged to contribute ſomething towards its ſupport and defence. It were to be wiſhed, indeed, that the ſalaries and perquiſites of many of the public offices were infinitely leſs than they are at preſent; as this would probably be the moſt effectual means of preventing thoſe violent conteſts among the courtiers for places, which ſo often diſturb the internal tranquillity of the kingdom, and which owe their riſe not ſo much to any regard which the candidates have for the intereſt of their country, as to the deſire of encreaſing their own private fortunes.

In the beginning of March petitions were delivered to the houſe by the merchants of Birmingham in Warwickſhire, and Sheffield in Yorkſhire, repreſenting, that the toy-trade of theſe and many other towns conſiſted generally of articles in which gold and ſilver might be ſaid to be manufactured, though in ſmall proportion, inaſmuch as the ſale of them depended upon ſlight ornaments of gold and ſilver: that, by a clauſe paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, obliging every perſon who ſhould ſell goods or wares, in which any gold or ſilver was manufactured, to take out an annual licence of forty ſhillings, they the petitioners were laid under great difficulties and diſadvantages: that not only the firſt ſeller, but every perſon thro' whoſe hands the goods or wares paſſed to the conſumer, was required to take out the ſaid licence. They therefore prayed that the houſe would take theſe hardſhips and inequalities into conſideration, and indulge them with ſuch relief as to the houſe ſhould ſeem proper.

The committee, to whom this affair was referred, having reſolved, that this impoſition was found prejudicial to the toy and cutlery trade of the kingdom, the houſe agreed to the reſolution; and a bill being prepared, under the title of "An act to amend the act made in the laſt ſeſſion, for repealing the duty granted by an act of the ſixth year in the reign of his late majeſty on ſilver plate, and for granting a duty on licences to be taken out by all perſons dealing in gold and ſilver plate," was enacted into a law by the royal ſanction. By this new regulation, ſmall quantities of gold and ſilver plate were allowed to be ſold without licence. Inſtead of the duty before payable upon licences, another was granted to be taken out by certain dealers in gold and ſilver plate, pawnbrokers, and refiners.

This affair being finiſhed, the houſe took into conſideration the claims of the proprietors of lands, purchaſed for the better ſecuring of his majeſty's docks, ſhips, and ſtores, at Chatham, Portſmouth, and Plymouth; and for better fortifying the town of Portſmouth and citadel of Plymouth, in purſuance of an act paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion. We have already mentioned the ſum granted for this purpoſe, in conſequence of a reſolution of the houſe, upon which a bill being founded, ſoon paſſed into a law without oppoſition.

The next bill which was introduced into the houſe related to the ſummons iſſued by the commiſſioners of the exciſe and juſtices of the peace, for the appearance of perſons offending againſt, or for forfeitures incurred by, the laws of exciſe. As ſome doubts had occurred with reſpect to the method of ſummoning in ſuch caſes, this bill, which afterwards received the royal aſſent, enacted, that ſummons left at the houſe, or uſual place of reſidence, or with the wife, child, or menial ſervants of the perſon ſo ſummoned, ſhould be held as legal notice, as well as the leaving ſuch notice at the houſe, workhouſe, warehouſe, ſhop, cellar, vault, or uſual place of reſidence of ſuch perſon, directed to him by his right or aſſumed name; and all dealers in coffee, tea, or chocolate, were ſubjected to the penalty of twenty pounds as often as they ſhould neglect to attend the commiſſioners of exciſe, when ſummoned in this manner.

In the month of April a bill was prepared for the more effectual preventing the fraudulent importation of cambricks; and while it was under conſideration, ſeveral merchants and wholeſale drapers of the city of London preſented a petition, explaining the grievances to which they and many thouſands of other traders would be ſubjected, ſhould the bill, as it then ſtood, be paſſed into a law. According to their requeſt, they were heard by their council on the juſtice of this remonſtrance; and ſome alterations were made to the bill in their favour. At length it was carried to the throne, and enacted into a law, to the following purport: That no cambricks, French lawns, or linens of this kind, uſually entered under the denomination of cambrics, ſhould be imported after the firſt day of next Auguſt, but in bales, caſes, or boxes, covered with ſackcloth or canvas, containing each one hundred whole pieces, or two hundred half pieces, on penalty of forfeiting the whole: that cambrics and French lawns ſhould be imported for exportation only, lodged in the king's warehouſe, and delivered out under like ſecurity and reſtrictions, as prohibited Eaſt India merchandize; and, on importation, pay only the half duty: that all cambrics and French lawns in the cuſtody of any perſons ſhould be depoſited, by the firſt of Auguſt, in the king's warehouſes, the bonds thereupon be delivered up, and the drawback on exportation paid; yet the goods ſhould not be delivered out again but for exportation: that cambrics and French lawns expoſed to ſale, or found in poſſeſſion of private perſons after the ſaid day, ſhould be forfeited, and liable to be ſearched for and ſeized, in like manner as other prohibited and unaccuſtomed goods are; and the offender ſhould forfeit two hundred pounds, over and above all other penalties and forfeitures inflicted by any former act: that, if any doubt ſhould ariſe concerning the ſpecies or quality of the goods, or the place where they were manufactured, the proof ſhould lie on the owner: finally, that the penalty of five pounds inflicted by a former act, and payable to the informer, on any perſon that ſhould wear any cambric or French lawns, ſhould ſtill remain in force, and be recoverable, on conviction, by oath of one witneſs, before one juſtice of the peace.

The laſt bill paſſed in the courſe of this ſeſſion, was that relating to the augmentation of the ſalaries of the judges in his majeſty's ſuperior courts of juſtice. A motion having been made for an inſtruction to the committee of ſupply to conſider of the ſaid augmentation, the chancellor of the Exchequer acquainted the houſe that this augmentation was recommended to them by his majeſty. Nevertheleſs, the motion was oppoſed, and a warm debate enſued. At length, however, being carried in the affirmative, the committee agreed to certain reſolutions, which were approved by the houſe, and digeſted into a bill. While this remained under deliberation, a motion was made for an inſtruction to the committee, that they ſhould have power to receive a clauſe or clauſes for reſtraining the judges, comprehended within the proviſions of the bill, from receiving any fee, gift, preſent, or entertainment, from any city, town, borough, or corporation, or from any ſheriff, gaoler, or other officer, upon their ſeveral reſpective circuits, and from taking any gratuity from any office or officer of any of the courts of law. Another motion was made for a clauſe reſtraining ſuch judges, barons, and juſtices, as were comprehended within the proviſions of the bill, from interfering otherwiſe than by giving their own votes, in any election of members to ſerve in parliament; but both theſe propoſals being put to the vote, were carried in the negative. Theſe two motions being over-ruled by the majority, the bill underwent ſome alterations; and having paſſed through both houſes in the ordinary courſe, was enacted into a law by the royal ſanction. With reſpect to the import of this act, it is no other than the eſtabliſhment of the ſeveral ſtamp-duties applied to the augmentation; and the appropriation of their produce in ſuch a manner, that the crown cannot alter the application of the ſums thus granted in parliament.

Beſide the bills I have already mentioned, ſeveral others were introduced into the houſe, all of which, in the end proved abortive; and the commons deliberated on many other important ſubjects, which however were not brought to any kind of maturity. In the beginning of the ſeſſion, a committee being appointed to reſume the enquiry concerning the regulation of weights and meaſures, a ſubject I have mentioned in the hiſtory of the preceding ſeſſion, the box, which contained a Troy pound weight, locked up by order of the houſe, was again produced by the clerk, in whoſe cuſtody it had been depoſited. This affair being carefully examined, the committee agreed to certain reſolutions *, upon which a future law may poſſibly be founded. In the mean time, it was ordered that all the weights referred to in the report ſhould be delivered to the clerk of the houſe, to be locked up and brought forth again occaſionally.

The commons likewiſe, among other articles of domeſtic œconomy, beſtowed ſome attention on the hoſpital for foundlings, which was now, more than ever, become a matter of national conſideration. The accounts relating to this charity having been laid before the members, were, together with the king's recommendation, referred to the committee of ſupply, where they procured the ſum of money which I have already mentioned among the other grants of the year. The commons afterwards reſolved themſelves into a committee, to deliberate on the ſtate of the hoſpital, and examine its accounts. On the third day of

* The reader, perhaps, may not be diſpleaſed with a ſight of theſe reſolutions, which I have therefore inſerted. They implied, that the ell ought to contain one yard and one quarter, according to the yard mentioned in the third reſolution of the former committee upon the ſubject of weights and meaſures: that the pole, or perch, ſhould contain in length five ſuch yards and a half; the furlong two hundred and twenty; and the mile one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty: that the ſuperficial perch ſhould contain thirty ſquare yards and a quarter; the rood one thouſand two hundred and ten; and the acre four thouſand eight hundred and forty: that, according to the fourth, fifth, and ſixth reſolutions of the former committee, upon the ſubject of weights and meaſures, agreed to by the houſe on the ſecond day of June in the preceding year, the quart ought to contain ſeventy cubical inches and one half; the pint thirty-five and one quarter; the peck five hundred and ſixty-four; and the buſhel two thouſand two hundred and fifty-ſix: that the ſeveral parts of the pound, mentioned in the eighth reſolution of the former committee, examined and adjuſted in preſence of this committee, examined and adjuſted in preſence of this committee, viz. the half pound or ſix ounces, quarter of a pound or three ounces, two ounces, one ounce, two half ounces, the five penny weight, three penny weight, two penny weight, and one penny weight; the twelve grains, ſix grains, three grains, two grains, and two of one grain each, ought to be the models of the ſeveral parts of the ſaid pound, and to be uſed for ſizing or adjuſting weights for the future: that all weights exceeding a pound ſhould be of braſs, copper, bell-metal, or caſt iron; and that all thoſe of caſt iron ſhould be made in the form, and with a handle of hammered iron, ſuch as the pattern herewith produced, having the mark of the weight caſt in the iron; and all weights of a pound, or under, ſhould be of gold, ſilver, braſs, copper, or bell-metal: that all weights of caſt iron ſhould have the initial letters of the name of the maker upon the upper bar of the handle; and all other weights ſhould have the ſame, together with the mark of the weight, according to the ſtandard, upon ſome convenient part thereof: that the yard, mentioned in the ſecond reſolution of the former committee, upon the ſubject of weights and meaſures, agreed to by the houſe in the laſt ſeſſion, being the ſtandard of length; and the pound, mentioned in the eigth reſolution, being the ſtandard of weight, ought to be depoſited in the court of the receipt of the Exchequer, and there ſafely kept, under the ſeals of the chancellor of the ſaid Exchequer, and of the chief baron, and the ſeal of office of the chamberlain of the Exchequer, and not to be opened but by the order and in the preſence of the chancellor of the Exchequer and chief baron for the time being: that the moſt effectual means to aſcertain uniformity in meaſures of length and weight, to be uſed throughout the realm, would be to appoint certain perſons, at one particular office, with clerks and workmen under them, for the purpoſe only of ſizing and adjuſting, for the uſe of the ſubjects, all meaſures of length, and all weights, being parts, multiples, or certain proportions of the ſtandards to be uſed for the future: that a model or pattern of the ſaid ſtandard yard, mentioned in the ſecond reſolution of the former committee, and now in cuſtody of the clerk of the houſe, and a model or pattern of the ſtandard pound, mentioned in the eighth reſolution of that committee, together with models or patterns of the parts of the ſaid pound, now preſented to the houſe, and alſo of the multiples of the ſaid pound, mentioned in this report (when the ſame are adjuſted) ſhould be kept in the ſaid office, in cuſtody of the ſaid perſons to be appointed for ſizing weights and meaſures, under the ſeal of the chief baron of the Exchequer for the time being, to be opened only by order of the ſaid chief baron, in his preſence, or the preſence of one of the barons of the Exchequer, on the application of the ſaid perſons for the purpoſe of correcting and adjuſting, as occaſion ſhould require, the patterns or models uſed at the ſaid office, for ſizing meaſures of length and weight, delivered out to the ſubjects: that the models or patterns of the ſaid ſtandard yard, and ſtandard pound aforeſaid, and alſo models or patterns of the parts and multiples aforeſaid of the pound, ſhould be lodged in the ſaid office for the ſizing of ſuch meaſures of lengths or weights, as being parts, multiples, or proportions of the ſaid ſtandards, ſhould hereafter be required by any of his majeſty's ſubjects: that all meaſures of length and weight, ſized at the ſaid office, ſhould be marked, in ſome convenient place thereof, with ſuch marks as ſhould be thought expedient, to ſhew the identity of the meaſures and weights ſized at the ſaid office, and to diſcover any frauds that may be committed therein: that the ſaid office ſhould be kept within a convenient diſtance of the court of Exchequer at Weſtminſter; and that all meaſures of length and weights, within a certain diſtance of London, ſhould be corrected and re-aſſized, as occaſion ſhould require, at the ſaid office: that in order to inforce uniformity in weights and meaſures to be uſed for the future, all perſons appointed by the crown to act as juſtices of the peace, in any county, city, or town corporate, being reſpectively counties within themſelves, throughout the realm, ſhould be impowered to hear and determine, and put the law in execution, in reſpect to weights and meaſures only, without any of them being obliged to ſue out a dedimus, or to act in any other matter; and the ſaid commiſſioners ſhould be impowered to ſue, impriſon, inflict, or mitigate, ſuch penalties as ſhould be thought proper; and have ſuch other authorities as ſhould be neceſſary for compelling the uſe of weights and meaſures, agreeable to the foreſaid ſtandards: that models or patterns of the ſaid ſtandard yard and pound, and of the parts and multiples thereof, beforementioned, ſhould be diſtributed in each county, in ſuch a manner as to be readily uſed for evidence, in all caſes where meaſures and weights ſhould be queſtioned before the ſaid commiſſioners, and for adjuſting the ſame in a proper manner.

May

May their reſolutions were reported, to the following effect: That the appointing, by the governors and guardians of the ſaid hoſpital, places in the ſeveral counties, ridings, or diviſions, in this kingdom, for the reception of expoſed and deſerted young children, would be attended with evil conſequences; and that the conveying of children from the country to the ſaid hoſpital was attended with many evil conſequences, and ought to be prevented. A bill was ordered to be prepared agreeable to this laſt reſolution, but never drawn up, and therefore productive of no effect.

To the view I have exhibited of the proceedings in parliament, it may not be amiſs to ſubjoin ſome meſſages which were ſent by the king to the houſe of commons. That relating to the vote of credit I have already mentioned in the account of the ſupply. On the twenty-ſixth day of April the chancellor of the Exchequer preſented to the houſe two meſſages, ſigned by his majeſty; one in favour of his ſubjects in North America, and the other in behalf of the Eaſt India company. In the former, he recommended to their conſideration the zeal and vigour with which his faithful ſubjects in North America had exerted themſelves in defence of his juſt rights and poſſeſſions; deſiring he might be enabled to give them a proper compenſation for the expences incurred by the reſpective provinces in levying, cloathing, and paying the troops raiſed in that country, according as the active vigour and ſtrenuous efforts of the ſeveral colonies ſhould appear to merit. In the latter, he deſired the houſe would impower him to aſſiſt the Eaſt India company in defraying the expence of a military force in the Eaſt Indies, to be maintained by them in lieu of a battalion of regular troops withdrawn from thence, and returned to Ireland. Both theſe meſſages were referred to the committee of ſupply, and produced the reſolutions upon each ſubject, which I have already explained.

The meſſage concerning a projected invaſion by the enemies of Great Britain I ſhall ſpecify in its proper place, when I come to record the circumſtances and miſcarriage of that deſign. In the mean time, it may not be improper to obſerve, that the thanks of the houſe of commons were voted and given to admiral Boſcawen and major-general Amherſt, for the ſervices they had done their king and country in North America; and the ſame compliment was paid to admiral Oſborne, for the ſucceſs of his cruize in the Mediterranean.

On the ſecond day of June, the commiſſioners appointed by his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, addreſſed to both houſes, importing, that the king approved of their conduct, and returned them his thanks for their condeſcenſion: that the hopes he had conceived of their ſurmounting the difficulties which lay in their way, were founded on the wiſdom, zeal, and affection, of ſo good a parliament; and that his expectations were fully anſwered: that they had conſidered the war in all its parts; and, notwithſtanding its long continuance, through the obſtinacy of the enemy, had made ſuch proviſion for the many different operations, as ought to convince the adverſaries of Great Britain, that it would be for their intereſt, as well as for the eaſe and relief of all Europe to embrace equitable and honourable terms of accommodation: that, by their aſſiſtance, the combined army in Germany had been completed; and powerful ſquadrons, as well as numerous bodies of land forces, were employed in America, in order to maintain the Britiſh rights and poſſeſſions, and annoy the enemy in the moſt ſenſible manner in that country: that, as France was making conſiderable preparations in her different ports, his majeſty had taken care to put his fleet at home in the beſt condition, both of ſtrength and ſituation, to guard againſt and repel any attempts that might be meditated againſt his kingdoms: that all his meaſures had been directed to aſſert the honour of his crown; to preſerve the eſſential intereſts of his faithful ſubjects; to ſupport the cauſe of the proteſtant religion, and public liberty; and he therefore truſted, that the uprightneſs of his intentions would draw down the bleſſing of heaven upon his endeavours: that he hoped the precautions they had taken to prevent and correct the exceſſes of the privateers, would produce the deſired effect; a conſideration which he had much at heart; for, though ſenſible of the utility of that ſervice, when under proper regulations, he was determined to do his utmoſt to prevent any injuries or hardſhips which might be ſuſtained by the ſubjects of neutral powers, as far as might be practicable, and conſiſtent with his majeſty's juſt right to hinder the trade of his enemies from being colluſively and fraudulently covered: that he not only thanked the commons, but likewiſe applauded the firmneſs and vigour with which they had acted, as well as their prudence in judging that, notwithſtanding the preſent burdens, the making ample proviſion for carrying on the war was the moſt probable means to bring it to an honourable and happy concluſion: that no attention ſhould be wanting, on his part, for the faithful application of what had been granted; and that he had nothing further to deſire, but that they would carry down the ſame good diſpoſitions, and propagate them in their ſeveral counties, which they had ſhewn in their proceedings during the ſeſſion. This ſpeech being finiſhed, the parliament was prorogued.

The miniſtry and people of England ſeemed equally to concur in their ſentiments, that the war ought to be proſecuted, as well in Europe as in America, with the utmoſt ſpirit and vigour.

For this purpoſe every preparation was made, and every meaſure adopted, that the neceſſity of the ſervice required. The navy was repaired and augmented; and in order to mann the different ſquadrons, the expedient of preſſing, that laſt reſource in caſes of neceſſity, was practiſed both by land and water with extraordinary rigour and ſeverity. A proclamation was iſſued, offering a conſiderable bounty to every ſeaman and even landman that ſhould, by a certain day, enter voluntarily into the ſervice.

As an additional encouragement to this claſs of people, the king promiſed his pardon to all ſeamen, who had deſerted from the reſpective ſhips to which they belonged, provided they ſhould return to their duty by the third day of July; but at the ſame time he declared, that thoſe who ſhould neglect this opportunity at a time when their country ſo much required their ſervice, would, upon being apprehended, incur the penalty of a court-martial, and if convicted, be deemed unfit objects of the royal mercy. All juſtices of the peace, mayors, and magiſtrates of corporations throughout Great Britain, were commanded to make particular ſearch for ſtraggling ſeamen fit for the ſervice, and to ſend all that ſhould be found to the neareſt ſea-port, that they might be ſent on board by the ſea-officer there commanding. Other methods, more gentle and effectual, were taken to levy and recruit the land-forces. New regiments were raiſed on his majeſty's promiſe, that every man ſhould be intitled to his diſcharge at the end of three years, and the premiums for liſting were increaſed.

Beſides theſe liberal indulgences from the government, conſiderable bounties were offered and given by cities, towns, corporations, and even by individuals, ſo univerſally were the people actuated by a real principle of love to their country. The example was ſet by the metropolis, where the common-council reſolved, that ſubſcriptions ſhould be received in the chamber of London, to be appropriated as bounty-money to ſuch perſons as ſhould enter voluntarily into his majeſty's ſervice. The city ſubſcribed a conſiderable ſum for this purpoſe; and a committee of aldermen and commons were appointed to attend at Guildhall, to receive and apply the ſubſcriptions. As a further encouragement to volunteers, they moreover reſolved, that every perſon ſo entering ſhould be intitled to the freedom of the city, at the expiration of three years, or ſooner, if the war ſhould be brought to a concluſion.

Theſe reſolutions being ſignified to the king, he was pleaſed to expreſs his approbation, and return his thanks to the city, in a letter from the ſecretary of ſtate to the lord-mayor. Large ſums were immediately ſubſcribed by different companies, and ſome private perſons; and in imitation of the capital, bounties were offered by almoſt every corporation, in every quarter of the united kingdom. At the ſame time, ſuch care was in taken in diſciplining the militia, that, before the cloſe of the year, the greater part of thoſe truly conſtitutional troops equalled the regular forces in the perfection of their exerciſe, and ſeemed to be in every reſpect as fit for actual ſervice.

But it is now time to convert the reader's attention to the Theatre of war on the continent of Europe, where we ſhall ſee the Engliſh and their allies, acquitting themſelves with remarkable ſpirit, reputation, and ſucceſs.

The Hanoverian army, commanded by prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, was ſtrengthened by freſh reinforcements from England, augmented with German recruits, regularly paid, and well ſupplied with every comfort and convenience which foreſight could ſuggeſt, or money procure; yet, in ſpight of all the precautions that could be taken, by the ſevere proceedings of the enemy they were cut off from ſome reſources, which even the extreme neceſſities of a campaign can hardly excuſe. On the ſecond day of January, the French regiment of Naſſau preſenting itſelf before the gate of Frankfort on the Mayne, a neutral imperial city, and demanding a paſſage, it was introduced, and conducted by a detachment of the garriſon, thro' the city as far as the gate of Saxen-hauſen, where it unexpectedly halted, and immediately diſarmed the guards. Before the inhabitants could recover from the conſternation into which they were thrown by this outrageous inſult, five other French regiments entered the place, and here their general the prince de Soubiſe eſtabliſhed his head-quarters. How deeply ſoever this violation of the laws of the empire might be reſented by all honeſt Germans, who retained affection for the conſtitutions of their country; it was a ſtep from which the French army derived a very manifeſt and important advantage; for it made them maſters of the whole courſe of the Mayne and the Upper Rhine; by which they received, without difficulty or danger, every ſpecies of ſupply from Mentz, Spire, Worms, and even the county of Alſace; while it maintained their communication with the chain formed by the Auſtrian forces and the army of the empire.

The plan of operations for the enſuing campaign was already concerted between the king of Pruſſia and prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick; and before the armies took the field, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes were fought, and quarters ſurpriſed. In the latter end of February, the prince of Yſembourg detached major-general Urſt with four battalions and a body of horſe, who advancing to Rhotenburg, fell upon the enemy's quarters in the night between the firſt and ſecond day of March, and drove them from Hirchfeld, Vacha, and all the Heſſian bailiwicks, of which they had taken poſſeſſion; but the Auſtrians ſoon returning in great numbers, and being ſuſtained by a detachment of French troops from Frankfort, the allies were obliged to retreat in their turn. In a few days, however, they themſelves were compelled to retire with great precipitation, though they did not all eſcape. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick, with a body of Pruſſian huſſars, fell upon them ſuddenly at Molrichſtadt, where he routed and diſperſed a regiment of Hohenzollern cuiraſſiers, and a battalion of the troops of Wurtzburg. He next day, which was the firſt of April, proceeded with a body of horſe and foot to Meinungen, where he found a conſiderable magazine, took two battalions priſoners, and ſurpriſed a third poſted at Waſungen, after having defeated ſome Auſtrian troops that were on the march to its relief. While the hereditary prince was thus employed, the duke of Holſtein, with another body of the confederates, conſtrained the French to abandon the poſt of Freyinſtenau.

But the great object was to diſlodge the enemy from Frankfort before they ſhould receive the expected reinforcements. Prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, being determined upon this enterprize, collected all his forces near Fulda, to the amount of forty thouſand choice troops, and began his march on the tenth day of April. On the thirteenth he came in ſight of the enemy, whom he found ſtrongly intrenched about the village of Bergen, between Frankfort and Hanau. Their general, the duke de Broglio, reckoned one of the beſt officers in France, in point of conduct and intrepidity, having received information of the prince's deſign, ſeized this poſt on the twelfth, the right of his army being at Bergen, and his center and flanks ſecured in ſuch a manner, that the allies could not make their attack any way but by the village.

Notwithſtanding the advantage of their ſituation, prince Ferdinand reſolved to give them battle, and made his diſpoſitions accordingly. About ten in the morning the grenadiers of the advanced guard began the attack on the village of Bergen with great fury, and ſuſtained a moſt terrible fire from eight German battalions, reinforced by ſeveral brigades of French infantry. The grenadiers of the allied army, though ſupported by ſeveral battalions under the command of the prince of Yſembourg, far from being able to diſlodge the enemy from the village, were, after a very obſtinate diſpute, obliged to retreat in ſome diſorder; but rallied again behind a body of Heſſian cavalry.

The allies being repulſed in three different attacks, prince Ferdinand began to think of a retreat, whilſt his loſs was yet inconſiderable, and the diſorder of his men eaſily to be repaired. But a retreat, in the face of a victorious enemy, was hazardous; and the day was not yet above half ſpent. In this exigence he made ſuch movements, as ſtrongly indicated a deſign of falling once more upon the village, in the enemy's right, and of making, at the ſame time, a new attack upon their left. Theſe appearances were farther countenanced by a cannonade, on both theſe poſts, ſupported with uncommon fury. The French, deceived by thoſe manœuvres, kept cloſe in their poſts: they expected a new and vigorous attack every moment, they returned the cannonade as briſkly as they could: and in this poſture things continued till night came on, when the prince made an eaſy retreat without diſorder, or moleſtation, and halted at Windeken.

The loſs of the allies in this action amounted to about two thouſand men in killed and wounded, including the prince of Yſembourg: nor was that of the French much leſs conſiderable. The confederates, indeed, ſuffered nothing in point of reputation; their courage and conduct, through the whole of the engagement, having been equally conſpicuous. Prince Ferdinand gained as much honour, and diſplayed as much ſkill, as could have been gained or diſplayed upon a more fortunate occaſion. The event, however, was, in its conſequences, far from indifferent: for the allies having miſſed their blow, the French ſtill kept poſſeſſion of Franckfort, and of all the advantages which they drew from that ſituation: they had time and means to receive their reinforcements: and they acquired, in a ſhort ſpace, ſuch a ſuperiority, as obliged prince Ferdinand, for a long time after, to content himſelf with acting on the defenſive.

In a few days after the battle, the prince thought proper to continue his retreat towards Fulda, in which his rear ſuffered conſiderably from a body of the enemy's light troops, under the command of M. de Blaiſel, who ſurpriſed two ſquadrons of dragoons, and a battalion of grenadiers. The firſt were taken or diſperſed; the laſt eſcaped with the loſs of their baggage. The allied army returned to their cantonments about Munſter, and the prince began to make preparations for taking the field in earneſt.

While the French enjoyed plenty in the neighbourhood of Duſſeldorp and Crevelt, by means of the Rhine, the allies laboured under dearth and ſcarcity of every ſpecies of proviſion, becauſe the country which they occupied was already exhauſted, and all the ſupplies were brought from an immenſe diſtance. The ſingle article of forage occaſioned ſuch enormous expence, as alarmed the adminiſtration of Great Britain, who, in order to prevent miſmanagement and fraud for the future, nominated a member of parliament inſpector-general of the forage, and ſent him over to Germany in the beginning of the year, with the rank and appointments of a general officer, that the importance of his character, and the nature of his office, might be a check upon thoſe who were ſuſpected of iniquitous appropriations.

Mean while, the French armies on the Upper and Lower Rhine, being put in motion, joined on the third day of June near Marpurg, under the command of the mareſchal de Contades, who proceeded to the northwards, and eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Corbach; from whence he detached a body of light troops to take poſſeſſion of Caſſel, which, at his approach, was abandoned by general Imhoff. The French army being encamped at Stadtberg, the duke de Broglio, who commanded the right wing, advanced from Caſſel into the territories of Hanover, where he ſeized Gottingen without oppoſition; while the allied army aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Lipſtadt, and encamped about Soeſt and Werle. Prince Ferdinand, finding himſelf inferior to the united forces of the enemy, was obliged to retire as they advanced, after having left ſtrong garriſons in Lipſtadt, Retberg, Munſter, and Minden.

Theſe precautions, however, did not ſeem to anſwer the intended purpoſe. Retberg was ſurprized by the duke de Broglio, who likewiſe took Minden by ſtorm, and made general Zaſtrow, with his garriſon of fifteen hundred men, priſoners of war; a misfortune ſo much the greater, as it was attended with the loſs of an immenſe magazine of hay and corn, which fell into the hands of the enemy. They likewiſe made themſelves maſters of Munſter, inveſted Lipſtadt, and all their operations were hitherto ſucceſsful. The regency of Hanover, alarmed at their progreſs, determined to provide for the worſt, by ſending their chancery and moſt valuable effects to Stade; from whence, in caſe of neceſſity, they might be tranſported by ſea to England. At the ſame time, they employed their utmoſt endeavours in preſſing men for recruiting and reinforcing the army under prince Ferdinand, who ſtill continued to retreat; and on the eleventh day of July transferred his head quarters from Oſnabrug to Bomte, near the Weſer. Here, having received intelligence that Minden was taken by the French, he ſent forward a detachment to ſecure the poſt of Stoltznau on that river, where on the fifteenth he arrived.

Mean while, the French general advancing to Minden, encamped in a ſtrong ſituation, having that town on his right, a ſteep hill on his left, a moraſs in front, and a rivulet in rear. The duke de Broglio commanded a ſeparate body between Hanſbergen and Minden, on the other ſide of the Weſer; and a third, under the duke de Briſſac, conſiſting of eight thouſand men, occupied a ſtrong poſt by the village of Coveldt, to facilitate the route of the convoys from Paderborn. Prince Ferdinand, having moved his camp from Stoltznau to Peterſhagen, detached the hereditary prince on the twenty-eighth day of July to Lubeke, from whence he diſloged the enemy; and, continuing his route to Rimſel, was joined by major-general Dreves, who had retaken Oſnabrug, and cleared all that neighbourhood of the enemy's parties; then he advanced towards Hervorden, and fixed his quarters at Kirchlinneger, to intercept the enemy's convoys from Paderborn. During theſe tranſactions, prince Ferdinand marched with the allied army in three columns from Peterſhagen to Hille, where it encamped, having a moraſs on the right, the village of Friedewalde on the left, and in front thoſe of Northemmern and Holtzenhauſen. Fifteen battalions and nineteen ſquadrons, with a brigade of heavy artillery, were left under the command of general Wangenheim on the left, behind the village of Dodenhauſen, which was fortified with ſome redoubts, defended by two battalions. Colonel Luckner, with the Hanoverian huſſars and a brigade of hunters, ſuſtained by two battalions of grenadiers, was poſted between Buckebourg and the Weſer, to watch the body of troops commanded by the duke of Broglio on the other ſide of the river.

On the laſt day of July the mareſchal de Contades, reſolving to attack the allied army, ordered the corps of Broglio to repaſs the river; and advancing in eight columns, about midnight, croſſed the rivulet of Barta, that runs along the moraſs, and falls into the Weſer at Minden. At day-break he drew up his army in order of battle, part of it fronting the corps of general Wangenheim at Dodenhauſen, and part of it facing Hille; the two wings conſiſting of infantry, and the cavalry being ſtationed in the centre. At three in the morning the enemy began to cannonade the prince's quarters at Hille from a battery of ſix cannon, which they had erected in the preceding evening on the dyke of Eickhorſt. This was probably the firſt intimation he received of their deſign. He forthwith cauſed two pieces of artillery to be conveyed to Hille, and ordered the officer of the picquet-guard there poſted, to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity: at the ſame time he ſent orders to general Gieſen, who occupied Lubeke, to attack the enemy's poſt at Eickhorſt; and this ſervice was ſucceſsfully performed. The prince of Anhalt, lieutenant-general for the day, took poſſeſſion with the reſt of the piquets of the village of Halen, where prince Ferdinand determined to ſuſtain his right. It was already in the hands of the enemy; but they ſoon abandoned it with precipitation.

The allied army, being put in motion, advanced in eight columns, and occupied the ground between Halen and Hemmern, while General Wangenheim's corps filled up the ſpace between this laſt village and Dodenhauſen. The enemy made their chief attack on the left, intending to force the infantry of Wangenheim's corps, and penetrate between it and the body of the allied army. For this purpoſe the duke de Broglio charged them with great impetuoſity; but was ſeverely checked by a battery of thirty cannon, prepared for his reception by the duke de Buckeburg, grand maſter of the artillery, and ſerved with admirable effect, under his own eye and direction. About five in the morning, both armies cannonaded each other: at ſix the fire of the muſquetry began with great fury, and the action became very hot towards the right, where ſix regiments of Engliſh infantry, and two battalions of Hanoverian guards, not only bore the whole brunt of the French carabineers and gendarmerie, but abſolutely broke every body of horſe and foot that advanced to attack them on the left and in the centre. The Heſſian cavalry, with ſome regiments of Holſtein, Pruſſian and Hanoverian horſe, commanded by lord George Sackville, whoſe ſecond was the marquis of Granby, were poſted at a conſiderable diſtance from the firſt line of infantry, and divided from it by a wood that bordered on a heath. Orders were ſent, during the action, to bring them up; but whether theſe orders were contradictory or unintelligible, imperfectly underſtood or careleſly executed, they did not arrive in time to have any ſhare in the action. Nevertheleſs, the enemy were repulſed in all their attacks with conſiderable loſs: at length they gave way in every part; and about noon, abandoning the field of battle, were purſued to the ramparts of Minden. In this action they loſt about ſeven thouſand men, with forty-three large cannon, and many colours and ſtandards; whereas the loſs of the allies did not amount to above two thouſand men, as it chiefly fell upon a few regiments of Britiſh infantry, commanded by the majors-general Waldegrave and Kingſley. To the extraordinary valour of theſe gallant brigades, and the fire of the Britiſh artillery, which was admirably ſerved by the captains Philips, Macbean, Drummond, and Foy, the victory was in a great meaſure attributed. That ſame night the enemy croſſed the Weſer, and burned the bridges over that river. Next day the garriſon of Minden ſurrendered at diſcretion, and here the victors found a great number of French officers wounded.

This victory, however important, would, in all probability, have been ſtill more deciſive, had not the Britiſh cavalry neglected to join in this action; but whether this neglect was owing to any confuſion in giving or delivering the orders, or to any miſapprehenſion in him who received them, will appear more clearly from the trial of the commander of the Engliſh forces, which I ſhall record amongſt the tranſactions of the enſuing year. Mean while it may not be improper to obſerve, that prince Ferdinand ſeemed to be of the laſt opinion, and this ſentiment he even inſinuated in the orders which he iſſued for returning his thanks to ſuch regiments and officers as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the action. Theſe orders were as follow:

"His ſerene highneſs orders his greateſt thanks to be given the whole army, for their bravery and good behaviour yeſterday, particularly to the Engliſh infantry, and the two battalions of Hanoverian guards; to all the cavalry of the left wing, and to general Wangenheim's corps, particularly the regiment of Holſtein, the Heſſian cavalry, the Hanoverian regiment du Corps and Hamerſtin's; the ſame to all the brigades of heavy artillery. His ſerene highneſs declares publickly, that next to God he attributes the glory of the day to the intrepidity and extraordinary good behaviour of theſe troops, which he aſſures them he ſhall retain the ſtrongeſt ſenſe of as long as he lives; and if ever, upon any occaſion, he ſhall be able to ſerve theſe brave troops, or any of them in particular, it will give him the utmoſt pleaſure. His ſerene highneſs orders his particular thanks to be likewiſe given to general Sporcken, the duke of Holſtein, lieutenant generals Imhoff and Urf. His ſerene highneſs is extremely obliged to the count de de Buckeburg, for his extraordinary care and trouble in the management of the artillery, which was ſerved with great effect; likewiſe to the commanding officers of the ſeveral brigades of artillery, viz. colonel Browne, lieutenant colonel Hutte, major Haſſe, and the three Engliſh captains, Philips, Drummond, and Foy. His ſerene highneſs thinks himſelf infinitely obliged to major generals Waldegrave and Kingſley, for their great courage, and the good order in which they conducted their brigades. His ſerene highneſs further orders it to be declared to lieutenant-general the marquis of Granby, that he is perſuaded, that if he had had the good fortune to have had him at the head of the cavalry of the right wing, his preſence would have greatly contributed to make the deciſion of that day more complete and more brilliant. In ſhort, his ſerene highneſs orders, that thoſe of his ſuite whoſe behaviour he moſt admired, be named, as the duke of Richmond, colonel Fitzroy, captain Ligonier, colonel Watſon, captain Wilſon, aid-de-camp to major-general Waldegrave, adjutant generals Erſtoff, Bulow, Durendolle, the count Tobe and Malerti; his ſerene highneſs having much reaſon to be ſatisfied with their conduct. And his ſerene highneſs deſires and orders the generals of the army, that upon all occaſions when orders are brought to them by his aids-de-camp, that they may be obeyed punctually, and without delay." The ſevere inſinuation concerning the diſobedience of orders, and the invidious compliment to a ſubordinate officer, were clear indications of the prince's ſentiments.

Mareſchal de Contades, in his firſt movements after the battle of Minden, ſeemed inclined to retreat through the defiles of Wittekendſtein to Paderborn; but he was fain to change his reſolution, in conſequence of his having received advice, that, on the very day of his own defeat, the duke de Briſſac was vanquiſhed by the hereditary prince in the neighbourhood of Coveldt, ſo that the paſſage of the mountains was rendered impracticable. The duke de Briſſac had been advantageouſly encamped with his left to the village of Coveldt, having the Werra in his front, and his right extending to the ſalt-pits. In this advantageous ſituation he was attacked by the hereditary prince and general de Kilmanſeg, with ſuch vivacity and addreſs, that his troops were totally routed, with the loſs of ſix cannon, and a conſiderable number of men killed, wounded, or taken priſoners. After the battle of Minden, colonel Freytag, at the head of the light troops, took, in the neighbourhood of Detmold, all the equipage of the mareſchal de Contades, the prince of Condé, and the duke de Briſſac, with part of their military cheſt and chancery, containing papers of the utmoſt conſequence.

Prince Ferdinand, having ſupplied Minden with a ſufficient garriſon, proceeded to Hervorden; and the hereditary prince croſſed the Weſer at Hamelen, in order to purſue the enemy, who retreated to Caſſel, and from thence, by the way of Marpurg, as far as Gieſſen. In a word, they were continually harraſſed by that enterpriſing prince, who ſeized every opportunity of attacking them in rear; took the greateſt part of their baggage; and compelled them to abandon every place they occupied in Weſtphalia. The number of his priſoners amounted to fifteen hundred men, beſides the garriſon left at Caſſel, which ſurrendered at diſcretion. He likewiſe ſurpriſed a whole battalion, and defeated a conſiderable detachment under the command of M. d'Armentieres.

In the mean time, the allied army advanced in regular marches; and prince Ferdinand, having ſecured Caſſel, detached general Imhoff, with a body of troops, to reduce the city of Munſter, which he accordingly began to batter with great fury; but M. d'Armentieres, being joined by a freſh body of troops from the Lower Rhine, advanced to its relief, and obliged Imhoff to abandon the ſiege. It was not long, however, before this general was alſo reinforced; then he meaſured back his march to Munſter, and the French commander retired in his turn. The place was immediately ſhut up by a cloſe blockade; which, however, did not prevent the introduction of ſupplies. The city of Munſter being an object of importance, was diſputed with great obſtinacy. Armentieres received reinforcements, and the body commanded by Imhoff was occaſionally augmented; but the ſiege was not formally undertaken till November, when ſome heavy artillery having arrived from England, the place was regularly inveſted, and the operations carried on with ſuch vigour, that, in a few days, the city ſurrendered on capitulation.

Prince Ferdinand having taken poſſeſſion of the town and caſtle of Marpurg, proceeded with the army to Neidar-Weimar, and there fixed his camp, while Contades remained at Gieſſen, on the ſouth ſide the river Lahne, where he was joined by a colleague in the perſon of the mareſchal d'Eſtrées. By this time he was become extremely unpopular among the troops, on account of the defeat at Minden, which he is ſaid to have attributed to the miſconduct of Broglio, who recriminated on him in his turn, and ſeemed to gain credit at the court of Verſailles.

While the two armies lay encamped in the neighbourhood of each other, nothing paſſed but ſkirmiſhes between the light troops, and little excurſive expeditions. The French army was employed in carrying off their magazines and fortifying Gieſſen, as if their intention was to retire to Frankfort on the Mayne; after having deſtroyed all the forage, and converted the country into a military deſart. In the beginning of November, the mareſchal duke de Broglio returned from Paris, whither he had lately gone, and aſſumed the command of their army, from whence Contades and d'Eſtrées immediately retired, with ſeveral other general officers that were ſenior to the new commander.

The duke of Wirtemberg having occupied the town of Fulda, the hereditary prince of Brunſwick reſolved to beat up his quarters. For this purpoſe, on the twenty-eighth day of November, he began his march from Marpurg, at the head of a ſelect body of forces. Next night they arrived at Augerbach, from whence they diſlodged the volunteers of Naſſau; and at one o'clock in the morning, of the thirtieth, they advanced directly to Fulda, where the duke of Wirtemberg, far from expecting ſuch a viſit, had invited all the faſhionable people in Fulda to a ſumptuous entertainment. The hereditary prince, having ſurveyed the avenues in perſon, took ſuch meaſures, that the troops of Wirtemberg, who were ſcattered in ſmall bodies, would have been cut off, if they had not haſtily retired into the town, where, however, they they found no ſhelter. The prince ruſhed into the place; and they retreated to the other ſide of the town, where four battalions of them were routed and taken; while the duke himſelf, with the reſt of his forces, filed off on the other ſide of the Fulda. Two pieces of cannon, two pair of colours, and all their baggage, fell into the hands of the victors; and the hereditary prince advanced as far as Rupertenrade, a place ſituated on the right of the French army. Perhaps this motion haſtened the reſolution of the duke de Broglio to relinquiſh Gieſſen, and fall back to Friedberg, where he fixed his head-quarters. The allied army immediately occupied his camp at Kleinlinnes and Heuchelem, and ſeemed determined to undertake the ſiege of Gieſſen.

While both armies remained in this poſition, the duke de Broglio was honoured with the ſtaff as mareſchal of France, and formed a reſolution to diſlodge the allies. Having recalled all his detachments, he advanced towards them on the twenty-fifth day of December; but found them ſo well diſpoſed to receive him, that he thought proper to abandon his deſign, and nothing but a mutual cannonade enſued; after which he returned to his former quarters. From Kleinlinnes the allied army proceeded to Corſdorf, where they were cantoned till the beginning of January, when they fell back as far as Marpurg, where prince Ferdinand eſtabliſhed his head-quarters. The enemy had by this time, recovered their ſuperiority, in conſequence of the hereditary prince's being detached with fifteen thouſand men to join the king of Pruſſia at Freyberg in Saxony. Nevertheleſs by the victory at Minden, the dominions of Hanover and Brunſwick were preſerved, and the enemy compelled to evacuate great part of Weſtphalia. Perhaps they might have been driven to the other ſide of the Rhine, had not the general of the allies been obliged to weaken his army for the ſupport of the Pruſſian monarch, who had ſuffered ſeveral loſſes in the courſe of this campaign.

It was not to any failure either in point of courage or conduct, that this warlike prince owed the ſeveral checks he ſuſtained. Even in the middle of winter, his troops, under general Manteufel, acted with great ſpirit againſt the Swedes in Pomerania. They reduced Damgarten, and ſeveral other places which the Swedes had garriſoned; and the froſt ſetting in, thoſe who were quartered in the iſle of Uſedom paſſed over the ice to Wolgaſt, which they took without much difficulty. They then laid ſiege to Demmen and Anclam at the ſame time, and the garriſons of both ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, to the number of two thouſand ſeven hundred men, including officers. In Demmen they found four and twenty pieces of cannon, with a large quantity of ammunition. In Anclam there was a conſiderable magazine, with ſix and thirty pieces of cannon, mortars, and howitzers. A large detachment under general Knobloch ſurpriſed Erfurth, and raiſed conſiderable contributions at Gotha, Eiſenach, and Fulda; from whence alſo they removed all the forage and proviſions to Saxe-Naumberg.

In the latter end of February, the Pruſſian major-general Woberſnow proceeded with a ſtrong body of troops from Glogau in Sileſia to Poland; and advancing by the way of Liſſa, inveſted the caſtle of the prince Sulkowſki, a Poliſh grandee, who had been very active againſt the intereſt of the Pruſſian monarch.

After ſome reſiſtance, he was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and was ſent priſoner with his whole garriſon to Sileſia. From hence Woberſnow wheeled off to Poſna, where he made himſelf maſter of a conſiderable magazine, guarded by two thouſand Coſſacks, who fled at his approach; and, having deſtroyed ſeveral others, returned to Sileſia. In April, the fort of Penamunde in Pomerania was ſurrendered to Manteufel; and about the ſame time a detachment of Pruſſian troops bombarded Schwerin, the capital of Mecklenburg. Mean while, reinforcements were ſent to the Ruſſian army in Poland, which in April began to aſſemble on the Viſtula. The court of Peterſburgh had likewiſe begun to prepare a large fleet, by means of which the army might be ſupplied with military ſtores and proviſions: but this armament was retarded by an accidental fire at Revel, which deſtroyed all the magazines and materials for ſhipbuilding, to an immenſe value.

About the latter end of March the king of Pruſſia aſſembled his army at Rhonſtock, near Strigau; and marching to the neighbourhood of Landſhut, took poſt at Bolchenhayn. On the other hand, the Auſtrian army, under the command of mareſchal Daun, was aſſembled at Munchengratz in Bohemia; and the campaign was opened by an exploit of general Beck, who ſurpriſed and made priſoners a battalion of Pruſſian grenadiers, quartered at Greifenberg on the frontiers of Sileſia. This advantage, however, was more than counterbalanced by the activity and ſucceſs of prince Henry, brother to the Pruſſian king, who commanded the army which wintered in Saxony. About the middle of April he advanced in two columns towards Bohemia, forced the paſs of Peterſwalde, deſtroyed the Auſtrian magazines at Auſſig, burned their boats upon the Elbe, ſeized the forage and proviſion which the enemy had left at Lowcſitz and Leutmeritz, and demoliſhed a new bridge which they had built for their convenience. At the ſame time, general Hulſen attacked the paſs of Paſsberg, guarded by general Renard, who was taken with two thouſand men, including fifty officers: then he proceeded to Satz, in hope of ſecuring the Auſtrian magazines: but theſe the enemy conſumed, that they might not fall into his hands, and retired towards Prague with the utmoſt precipitation.

Prince Henry, having happily performed theſe exploits, and filled all Bohemia with alarm and conſternation, returned to Saxony, and diſtributed his troops in quarters of refreſhment in the neighbourhood of Dreſden. In a few days, however, they were again put in motion, and advanced to Obelgeburgen; from whence he proſecuted his route through Voigtland, in order to attack the army of the empire in Franconia. He accordingly entered this country, by the way of Hoff, on the ſeventh of May, and the next day ſent a detachment to attack general Macguire, who commanded a body of Imperialiſts at Aſch, and ſuſtained the charge with great gallantry; but finding himſelf in danger of being overpowered by numbers, he retreated in the night towards Egra. The army of the Empire, commanded by the prince de Deux-ponts, being unable to check the progreſs of the Pruſſian general, retired from Cullembach to Bamberg, and from thence to Nuremberg, where, in all probability, they would not have been ſuffered to remain unmoleſted, had not prince Henry been recalled to Saxony. He had already taken Cronach and the caſtle of Rotenberg, and even advanced as far as Bamberg, when he received intelligence, that a body of Auſtrians, under general Gemmingen, had forced their way into Saxony.

This diverſion effectually ſaved the army of the empire, as prince Henry immediately returned to the electorate, after having laid the biſhoprick of Bamberg, and the marquiſate of Cullembach, under contribution, deſtroyed all the magazines provided for the Imperial army, and ſent fifteen hundred priſoners to Leipſic. A party of Imperialiſts, under count Palfy, attempted to harraſs him in his retreat; but they were defeated near Hoff, with conſiderable ſlaughter: nevertheleſs, the Imperial army, though now reduced to ten thouſand men, returned to Bamberg: and as the Pruſſians approached the frontiers of Saxony, the Auſtrian general Gemmingen retired into Bohemia. During all theſe tranſactions, the mareſchal count Daun remained with the grand Auſtrian army at Schurtz in the circle of Koningſgratz; while the Pruſſians, commanded by the king in perſon, continued quietly encamped between Landſhut and Schweidnitz. General Fouquet headed a large body of troops in the ſouthern part of Sileſia; but theſe being moſtly withdrawn, in order to oppoſe the Ruſſians, the Auſtrian general de Ville, who hovered on the frontiers of Moravia, with a conſiderable detachment, took advantage of this circumſtance, and, advancing into Sileſia, encamped within ſight of Neiſs.

In the beginning of June, the king of Pruſſia, being informed that the Ruſſian army had begun their march from the Viſtula, ordered the ſeveral bodies of his troops, under Hulſen and Woberſnow, reinforced by detachments from his other armies, to join the forces under count Dohna, as general in chief, and march into Poland. Accordingly they advanced to Meritz, where, on the fifteenth day of June, the count publiſhed the following declaration:

"His Pruſſian majeſty, finding himſelf under a neceſſity to cauſe part of his armies to enter the territories of the republic of Poland, in order to protect them againſt the threatened invaſion of the enemy, declares, that,

"It muſt not be underſtood that his majeſty by this ſtep taken, intends to make any breach in the regard he has always had for the illuſtrious republic of Poland, or to leſſen the good underſtanding which has hitherto ſubſiſted between them, but, on the contrary, to ſtrengthen the ſame, in expectation that the illuſtrious republic will, on its part, act with the like neighbourly and friendly good will as is granted to the enemy, than which nothing more is deſired.

"The nobility, gentry, and magiſtracy, in their reſpective diſtricts, between the frontiers of Pruſſia, ſo far as beyond Poſen, are required to furniſh all kind of proviſions, corn, and forage, neceſſary to ſupport an army of 40,000 men, with the utmoſt diſpatch, with an aſſurance of being paid ready money for the ſame. But if, contrary to expectation, any deficiency ſhould happen in ſupplying this demand, his majeſty's troops will be obliged to forage, and uſe the ſame means as thoſe taken by the enemy for their ſubſiſtence.

"In confidence, therefore, that the ſeveral juriſdictions, upon the Pruſſian frontiers, within the territories of Poland, will exert themſelves to comply with this demand as ſoon as poſſible, for the ſubſiſtence of the royal army of Pruſſia, they are aſſured that thereby all diſorders will be prevented, and whatever is delivered will be paid for in ready money."

Two days after he iſſued another manifeſto, to this effect. "It was with the greateſt aſtoniſhment that the king, my moſt gracious lord and maſter, heard that ſeveral of his own ſubjects had ſuffered themſelves to be ſeduced from their allegiance ſo far, as to enter into the ſervice of a potentate, with whom he is at war; his majeſty, therefore, makes known by theſe preſents, that all of his ſubjects ſerving in the enemy's armies, who ſhall be taken with arms in their hands, ſhall, agreeably to all laws, be ſentenced to be hanged without mercy, as traitors to their king and country. Of which all whom it may concern are deſired to take notice, &c."

On the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month another declaration was iſſued to this purpoſe. "We invite and deſire, that the nobility, archbiſhops, biſhops, abbeys, convents, ſeignories, magiſtrates, and inhabitants of the republic of Poland, on the road to Poſnania, and beyond it, would repair in perſon, or by deputies, in the courſe of this week, or as ſoon after as poſſible, to the Pruſſian head quarters, there to treat with the commander in chief, or the commiſſary at war, for the delivery of forage and proviſions for the ſubſiſtence of the army, to be paid for with ready money.

"We promiſe and aſſure ourſelves, that no perſon in Poland will attempt to ſeduce the Pruſſian troops to deſert; that no aſſiſtance will be given them in ſuch perfidious practices; that they will neither be ſheltered, concealed, or lodged; which would be followed by very diſagreeable conſequences: we expect, on the contrary, that perſons of all ranks and conditions will ſtop any run away or deſerter, and deliver him up at the firſt advanced poſt, or at the head-quarters; and all expences attending the ſame ſhall be paid, and a reaſonable gratification ſuperadded.

"If any one hath any inclination to enter into the king of Pruſſia's ſervice, with an intention to behave well and faithfully, he may apply to the head-quarters, and be aſſured of a capitulation for three or four years.

"If any prince or member of the republic of Poland be diſpoſed to aſſemble a body of men, and to join in a troop, or in a company, the Pruſſian army, to make a common cauſe with it, he may depend on a gracious reception, and that due regard will be ſhewn to his merit, &c."

From Meritz the Pruſſians marched towards Poſna, where they found the Ruſſian army under count Soltikoff ſtrongly encamped, having in their rear that city and the river Warta, and in their front a formidable intrenchment mounted with a great number of cannon. Count Dohna finding it impoſſible to attack them in this ſituation with any proſpect of ſucceſs, endeavoured to cut off their ſupplies from the eaſtward; but for want of proviſion, was, in a little time, obliged to return towards the Oder: then the Ruſſians advanced to Zullichau in Sileſia. The king of Pruſſia thinking count Dohna had been rather too cautious, conſidering the emergency of affairs, gave him leave to retire for the benefit of his health, and conferred his command upon general Wedel, who reſolved immediately to give the Ruſſians battle. Thus determined, he marched againſt them in two columns; and, on the twenty-third day of July, attacked them at Kay, near Zullichau, where, after a very obſtinate engagement, he was repulſed with great loſs, Woberſnow being killed, and Manteufel wounded in the action; and in a few days, the Ruſſians took poſſeſſion of Franckfort upon the Oder.

By this time, the armies of count Daun and the king of Pruſſia had made ſeveral motions. The Auſtrians having quitted their camp at Schurtz, advanced towards Zittau in Luſatia, where having halted a few days, they reſumed their march, and encamped at Gorlitzhayn, between Sudenberg and Mark-Liſſau His Pruſſian majeſty, in order the more narrowly to watch their motions, marched by the way of Herchberg to Lahn; and his vanguard ſkirmiſhed with that of the Auſtrians commanded by Laudohn, who entered Sileſia by the way of Grieffenberg. The Auſtrian general was obliged to retire with loſs; while the king penetrated into Sileſia, that he might be at hand to act againſt the Ruſſians, whoſe progreſs was now become truly alarming. He no ſooner received intimation that Wedel had been worſted, than he marched with a ſelect body of ten thouſand men from his camp in Sileſia, in order to take upon him the command of Wedel's army, leaving the reſt of his forces ſtrongly encamped, under the direction of his brother prince Henry, who had joined him before this event. Count Daun being informed of the king's intention, and knowing the Ruſſians were very defective in cavalry, immediately detached a body of twelve thouſand horſe, to join them, under the command of Laudohn; and theſe, penetrating in two columns through Sileſia and Luſatia, with ſome loſs, arrived in the Ruſſian camp at a very critical juncture.

Mean while the king of Pruſſia joined general Wedel on the fourth day of Auguſt at Muhlroſe, where he aſſumed the command of the army: but finding it greatly inferior to the enemy, he recalled general Finck, whom he had detached ſome time before, with a body of nine thouſand men, to oppoſe the progreſs of the Imperialiſts in Saxony: for when prince Henry joined his brother in Sileſia, the army of the Empire had entered that electorate. Thus reinforced, the number of the king's army at Muhlroſe did not amount to above fifty thouſand, whereas the Ruſſians were more numerous by about forty thouſand. They had choſen a ſtrong camp at the village of Cunerſdorf, almoſt oppoſite to Franckfort upon the Oder, and encreaſed the natural ſtrength of their ſituation by intrenchments mounted with a formidable artillery. In other circumſtances, it might have been deemed a fooliſh and ridiculous enterprize, to attack ſuch an army under ſuch complicated diſadvantages: but here was no room for heſitation. The king's affairs ſeemed to require a deſperate effort; and perhaps, in his ſituation, raſhneſs could hardly dictate any thing which would not have been recommended by prudence.

Having determined to hazard an attack, he made his diſpoſitions, and on the twelfth day of Auguſt, at two in the morning, his troops were in motion. The army being drawn up in a wood, advanced towards the enemy; and about eleven, the action was begun with a ſevere cannonade. This having produced the deſired effect, he charged the left wing of the Ruſſian army with his beſt troops formed in columns. After a very obſtinate diſpute, the enemy's entrenchments were forced with great ſlaughter, and ſeventy pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the Pruſſians. A narrow defile was afterwards paſſed, and ſeveral redoubts that covered the village of Cunerſdorf were taken by aſſault, one after another. One half of the taſk was not yet performed: The Ruſſians made a firm ſtand at the village: but they were overborne by the impetuoſity of the Pruſſians, who drove them from poſt to poſt up to the laſt redoubts they had to defend. As the Ruſſians kept their ground until they were hewn down in their ranks, this ſucceſs was not acquired without infinite labour, and a conſiderable expence of blood. After a furious conteſt of ſix hours, fortune ſeemed to declare ſo much in favour of the Pruſſians, that the king diſpatched the following billet to the queen at Berlin: "Madam, we have driven the Ruſſians from their intrenchments. In two hours expect to hear of a glorious victory."

This news arrived at Berlin juſt as the poſt was ſetting out, and the friends of the king of Pruſſia throughout Europe exulted in the proſpect of a ſure and deciſive victory. Mean while fortune was preparing for him a terrible reverſe. The Ruſſians were ſtaggered, not routed. General Soltikoff rallied his troops, and reinforced his left wing under cover of a redoubt, which was erected on an eminence called the Jews Burying-ground, and here they ſtood in order of battle, with the moſt reſolute countenance; favoured by the ſituation, which was naturally difficult of acceſs, and now rendered almoſt impregnable by the fortification, and a numerous artillery, ſtill greatly ſuperior to that of the Pruſſians. Had the king contented himſelf with the advantage already gained, all the world would have acknowledged he had fought againſt terrible odds with aſtoniſhing proweſs; and that he judiciouſly deſiſted, when he could no longer perſevere without incurring the imputation of folly and imprudence. His troops had not only ſuffered ſeverely from the enemy's fire, which was cloſe, deliberate, and well directed, but they were fatigued by the hard ſervice, and fainting with the heat of the day, which was exceſſive. His general officers are ſaid to have reminded him of all theſe circumſtances; and to have diſſuaded him from hazarding an attempt attended with ſuch danger and difficulty, as even an army of freſh troops could hardly hope to ſurmount. He rejected this ſalutary advice, and ordered his infantry to begin a new attack, which being an enterpriſe beyond their ſtrength, they were repulſed with great ſlaughter. Being afterwards rallied, they returned to the charge: they miſcarried again, and their loſs was redoubled. Being thus rendered unfit for further ſervice, the cavalry ſucceeded to the attack, and repeated their unſucceſsful efforts, until they were almoſt broke and entirely exhauſted.

Longit. East from London
G. Roller Sculp.

At this critical juncture, the whole body of the Auſtrian and Ruſſian cavalry, which had hitherto remained inactive, and were therefore freſh and in ſpirits, fell in among the Pruſſian horſe with great fury, broke their line at the firſt charge, and forcing them back upon the infantry, threw them into irreparable diſorder. The Pruſſian army being thus involved in confuſion, was ſeized with a pannic, and in a few minutes totally defeated and diſperſed, notwithſtanding the perſonal efforts of the king, who hazarded his life in the hotteſt parts of the battle, led on his troops three times to the charge, while two horſes were killed under him, and his cloaths, in ſeveral parts, penetrated with muſquet balls. His army being routed, and the greater part of his generals either killed or diſabled by wounds, nothing but the approach of night could have ſaved him from total ruin. When he abandoned the field of battle, he diſpatched another billet to the queen, couched in theſe terms: "Remove from Berlin with the royal family. Let the archives be carried to Potſdam. The town may make conditions with the enemy." The horror and confuſion which this intimation produced at Berlin may be eaſily conceived: horror the more aggravated, as it ſeized them in the midſt of their rejoicing occaſioned by the firſt diſpatch; and this was ſtill more dreadfully augmented, by a ſubſequent indiſtinct relation, importing, that the army was totally routed, the king miſſing, and the enemy in full march to Berlin. The battle of Cunerſdorf was by far the moſt bloody action that had happened ſince the commencement of hoſtilities. The loſs of the Pruſſians in killed, wounded, and priſoners, amounted to almoſt twenty thouſand men. General Putkammer was among the ſlain. The generals Seydelitz, Itzenplitz, Hulſen, Fink, and Wedel, the prince of Wurtemberg, and five major generals, were wounded. The loſs of the enemy, though not ſo conſiderable as that of the Pruſſians, could not fall much ſhort of ten thouſand.

The day after the battle, the king of Pruſſia repaſſed the Oder, and encamped at Retwein. From thence he moved to Fuſtenwalde, and placed himſelf in ſuch a manner, that the Ruſſians did not venture to make any attempt upon Berlin. He continually watched their army; part of which, inſtead of turning towards Brandenburgh, marched into Luſatia, where it joined that of the Auſtrians. Here the victorious general Soltikoff, for the firſt time, met M. Daun, and amidſt rejoicings and congratulations, conſulted about the means of improving their ſucceſs. The Ruſſian and Auſtrian armies, thus united, ſcarce ſeemed, from their preſent ſtrength and their paſt victories, to have any other deliberation left, than of what part of the Pruſſian dominions they ſhould take immediate poſſeſſion. The king had been twice defeated with a vaſt loſs. He was cut off from all communication with the army of his brother, prince Henry; yet, to the aſtoniſhment of the world, the ſuperior, the victorious, and the united armies acted upon the defenſive, and were curbed in all their deſigns, by the inferior, the beaten, and divided. Never ſhone the genius of his Pruſſian majeſty with greater luſtre than in his conduct after the battle of Cunerſdorf. In a few days after ſo terrible a defeat, every thing was in order in his camp. He reaſſembled and refreſhed his broken troops; he furniſhed himſelf with cannon from the arſenal at Berlin, which likewiſe ſupplied him with a conſiderable number of recruits; he recalled general Kleiſt, with five thouſand men, from Pomerania; and, in a little time, retrieved his former importance.

The army of the empire having entered Saxony, where it reduced Leipſic, Torgau, and even took poſſeſſion of Dreſden itſelf, the king detached ſix thouſand men under general Wunch, to oppoſe the progreſs of the Imperialiſts in that electorate; and obſerving the Ruſſians intended to beſiege Great Glogau, he, with the reſt of his army, took poſt between them and that city, ſo as to diſappoint their deſign. While the four great armies, commanded by the king of Pruſſia, general Soltikoff, prince Henry, and count Daun, lay encamped in Luſatia, and on the borders of Sileſia, watching the motions of each other, the war was carried on by detachments with great vivacity. General Wunch having retaken Leipſic, and joined Finck at Eulenburg, the united body began their march towards Dreſden; and a detachment from the army of the empire, which had encamped near Dobelin, retired at their approach. As they advanced to Noſſin, general Haddick relinquiſhed the advantageous poſt he occupied near Roth Scemberg, and being joined by the whole army of the empire, reſolved to attack the Pruſſian generals, who now encamped at Corbitz near Meiſſen; accordingly, on the twenty-firſt day of September, he marched towards them, and endeavoured to diſlodge them by a furious cannonade, which was mutually maintained from morning to night, when he found himſelf obliged to retire with conſiderable loſs; leaving the field of battle, with about five hundred priſoners, in the hands of the Pruſſians.

This advantage was ſucceeded by another exploit of prince Henry; who, on the twenty-third day of the month, quitted his camp at Hornſdorf, near Gorlitz, and, after an incredible march of eleven German miles, by the way of Rothenburg, arrived, about five in the afternoon, at Hoyerſwerda, where he ſurpriſed a body of four thouſand men, commanded by general Veyla, killed ſix hundred, and made twice that number priſoners; including the commander himſelf. After this atchievement, he joined the corps of Finck and Wunch; while mareſchal Daun likewiſe abandoned his camp in Luſatia, and made a forced march to Dreſden, in order to defeat the prince's ſuppoſed deſign on that capital. The Ruſſians, diſappointed in their ſcheme upon Glogau, had repaſſed the Oder at Neuſalze, and were encamped at Frauſtadt; general Laudohn, with a body of Auſtrians, lay at Schlichtingſkeim; and the king of Pruſſia at Koben: all three on, or near the banks of that river.

Prince Henry obſerving his army almoſt environed by Auſtrian detachments, ordered general Finck to drive them from Vogelſang, which they abandoned accordingly; and ſent Wunch with ſix battalions and ſome cavalry acroſs the Elbe, to join the corps of general Rebentiſh at Wittenberg, whither he had retired from Duben, at the approach of the Auſtrians. On the twenty-ninth day of October the duke d'Aremberg, with ſixteen thouſand Auſtrians, decamped from Dammitch, in order to ſeize the heights near Pretſch, and was attacked by general Wunch, who, being poſted on two eminences, cannonaded the Auſtrians in their march with conſiderable effect; and the prince took twelve hundred priſoners, including lieutenant-general Gemmingen, and twenty inferior officers, with ſome cannon, great part of their tents, and a large quantity of baggage. The duke was conſtrained to change his route, while Wunch marched from Duben to Eulenburg: and general Waſſerſleben entered Strehla, where next day the whole army encamped. In this ſituation the prince continued, till the ſixteenth day of November; when, being in danger of having his communication with Torgau cut off by the enemy, he removed to a ſtrong camp, where his left flank was covered by that city and the river Elbe; his right being ſecured by a wood, and great part of his front by an impaſſable moraſs.

Here he was reinforced with above twenty thouſand men from Sileſia, and joined by the king himſelf; who forthwith detached general Finck with nineteen battalions, and thirty-five ſquadrons, to take poſſeſſion of the defiles of Maxen and Ortendorf, with a view to prevent the retreat of the Auſtrians to Bohemia. This motion obliged Daun to retire to Plauen; and the king advanced to Wilſdurff, imagining that he had effectually ſucceeded in his deſign. Letters were ſent to Berlin and Magdeburg, intimating that Count Daun would be forced to hazard a battle, as he had now no reſource but in victory. Finck had no ſooner taken poſt on the hill near the village of Maxen, than the Auſtrian general ſent officers to examine his ſituation, and immediately determined to attack him with the corps de reſerve under the Baron de Sincere, which was encamped in the neighbourhood of Dippodeſwalda. It was forthwith divided into four columns, which filed off through the neighbouring woods; and the Pruſſians never dreamed of their approach, until they ſaw themſelves intirely ſurrounded.

In this emergency they defended themſelves with their cannon and muſquetry, until they were overpowered by numbers, and their battery was taken: then they retired to another riſing-ground, where they rallied; but were driven from eminence to eminence, until, by favour of the night, they made their laſt retreat to Falkenhayn. In the mean time count Daun had made ſuch diſpoſitions, that at day-break general Finck had found himſelf intirely incloſed, without the leaſt poſſibility of eſcaping, and ſent a trumpet to count Daun to demand a capitulation. This was granted in one ſingle article, importing, that he and eight other Pruſſian generals, with the whole body of troops they commanded, ſhould be received as priſoners of war. He was obliged to ſubmit; and his whole corps, amounting to nineteen battalions and thirty-five ſquadrons, with ſixty-four pieces of cannon, fifty pair of colours, and twenty-five ſtandards, fell into the hands of the Auſtrian general.

This misfortune was the more mortifying to the king of Pruſſia, as it implied a cenſure on his conduct, for having detached ſuch a numerous body of troops to a ſituation where they could not be ſupported by the reſt of his army. On the other hand, the court of Vienna exulted in this victory as an infallible proof of Daun's ſuperior talents; and, in point of glory and advantage, much more than an equivalent for the loſs of the Saxon army, which had ſurrendered in much the ſame manner, and very near the ſame place, in the year 1756.

The king of Pruſſia had not time to recover from this ſtroke, under which he was yet ſtaggering, when he received another, and a ſevere blow. General Diercke, who was poſted with ſeven battalions of infantry, and a thouſand horſe, on the right bank of the Elbe, oppoſite to Meiſſen, finding it impracticable to lay a bridge of pontoons acroſs the river, on account of the floating ice, was obliged to tranſport his troops in boats; and when all were paſſed, except himſelf, with the rear guard, conſiſting of three battalions, he was on the third day of December, in the morning, attacked by a ſtrong body of Auſtrians, and taken, with all his men, after an obſtinate diſpute. The king of Pruſſia, weakened by theſe two ſucceſſive defeats, that happened in the rear of an unfortunate campaign, would hardly have been able to maintain his ground at Freyberg, had he not been at this juncture reinforced by the body of troops under the command of the hereditary prince of Brunſwic. As for Daun, the advantages he had gained did not elevate his mind above the uſual maxims of his cautious diſcretion. Inſtead of attacking the king of Pruſſia, reſpectable and formidable even in adverſity, he quietly occupied the ſtrong camp at Pirna, where he might be at hand to ſuccour Dreſden, in caſe it ſhould be attacked, and preſerve his communication with Bohemia.

By this time the Ruſſians had retired to winter quarters in Poland; and the Swedes, after a fruitleſs excurſion in the abſence of Manteufel, retreated to Stralſund in the iſle of Rugen. This campaign, therefore, did not prove more deciſive than the laſt. Abundance of lives were loſt; and a great part of Germany was expoſed to rapine, murder, famine, deſolation, and every ſpecies of miſery that accompanies war. In vain did the confederated powers of Auſtria, Ruſſia, and Sweden, exert their united efforts to cruſh the Pruſſian monarch. Though his army had been defeated, and he himſelf totally overthrown, with great ſlaughter, in the heart of his own dominions; though he appeared in a deſperate ſituation, encompaſſed by hoſtile armies, and two conſiderable detached bodies of his troops were taken or deſtroyed; yet he kept all his adverſaries at bay till the approach of winter, which proved his beſt auxiliary; and even maintained his footing in the electorate of Saxony, which ſeemed to be the prize conteſted between him and the Auſtrian general. Yet, long before the approach of winter, one would have imagined that he muſt have been cruſhed between the ſhock of ſo many adverſe hoſts, had they been intent upon cloſing him in, and heartily concurred for his deſtruction: but, inſtead of urging the war with accumulated force, they acted in ſeparate bodies, and with jealous eye ſeemed to regard the progreſs of each other. It was not therefore to any compunction, or kind of forbearance in the court of Vienna, that the inactivity of Daun was owing. The reſentment of the houſe of Auſtria ſeemed, on the contrary, to glow with redoubled fury, and the majority of the Germanic body appeared to engage heartily in her quarrel.

When the Proteſtant ſtates in arms againſt the court of Vienna were ſubjected to the ban of the empire, the evangelical body, though without the concurrence of the Swediſh and Daniſh miniſters iſſued an arret at Ratisbon in the month of November in the laſt year, and to this annexed the twentieth article of the capitulation ſigned by the emperor at his election, in order to demonſtrate that the Proteſtant ſtates claimed nothing but what was agreeable to the conſtitution. They declared that their aſſociation was no more than a mutual engagement, by which they obliged themſelves to adhere to the laws, without ſuffering under any pretext, that the power of putting under the ban of the empire, ſhould reſide wholly in the emperor. They affirmed, that this power was renounced, in expreſs terms, by the capitulation: they therefore refuſed to admit, as legal, any ſentence of the ban, deficient in the requiſite conditions; and inferred, that, according to law, neither the elector of Brandenburg, nor the elector of Hanover, nor the duke of Wolfenbuttle, nor the landgrave of Heſſe, nor the count of Lippe Buckeburg, ought to be proſcribed.

The Imperial Proteſtant cities having acceded to this arret or declaration, the emperor, in a reſcript, required them to retract their acceſſion to the reſolution of the evangelic body: and this reſcript having produced no effect, the arret was anſwered in February by an Imperial decree of commiſſion, carried to the dictature, importing, that the imperial court could not longer heſitate about the execution of the ban, without infringing that very article of the capitulation which they had ſpecified: that the invalidity of the arret was manifeſt, inaſmuch as the electors of Brandenburg and Brunſwick, the dukes of Saxe Gotha and Brunſwick Wolfenbuttle, and the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, were the very perſons who diſturbed the empire: this, therefore, being an affair in which they themſelves were parties, they could not poſſibly be qualified to concur in a reſolution of this nature: beſides, the number of the other ſtates which had acceded was very conſiderable: for theſe reaſons, the emperor could not but conſider the reſolution in queſtion as an act whereby the general peace of the empire was diſturbed, both by the parties that had incurred the ban, and by the ſtates which had joined them, in order to ſupport and favour their frivolous pretentions. His Imperial majeſty expreſſed his hope and confidence, that the other electors, princes, and ſtates of the empire, would vote the ſaid reſolution to be null, and of no force; and never ſuffer ſo ſmall a number of ſtates, who were adherents of and abetters to the diſturbers of the empire, to prejudice the rights and prerogatives of the whole Germanic body; to abuſe the name of the aſſociated eſtates of the Augſbourg confeſſion, in order forcibly to impoſe a factum, intirely repugnant to the conſtitution of the empire; to deprive their co-eſtates of the right of voting freely, and thereby endeavouring totally to ſubvert the ſyſtem of the Germanic body.

The implacability of the court of Vienna was exceeded only by the perſeverance of the French miniſtry. Though their numerous army had not gained one inch of ground in Weſtphalia, the campaign on that ſide having ended exactly where it had begun; though their chief ſettlements in the Weſt Indies had fallen into the hands of Great Britain, and they had already laid their account with the loſs of Quebec; though their coffers were entirely drained, and their confederates clamoured for the payment of their ſubſidies; they ſtill determined to maintain the war in Germany: and this, it muſt be owned, was the moſt politic reſolution which they could poſſibly adopt; as there their whole force could be eaſily employed to much more advantage than any other part of the world, and that too without any great augmentation of the ordinary expence. Some of the ſprings of their national wealth were indeed exhauſted, or diverted into other channels: but the ſubjects declared for a continuation of the war, and the neceſſities of the ſtate were ſupplied by the loyalty and attachment of the people. They not only acquieſced in the bankruptcy of public credit, when the court ſtopt payment of the intereſt on twelve different branches of the national debt; but they likewiſe ſent in large quantities of plate to be melted down, and coined into ſpecie, for the maintenance of the war. All the bills drawn on the government by the colonies were proteſted, to an immenſe amount; and a ſtop was put to all the annuities granted at Marſeilles, on ſums borrowed for the uſe of the marine. Beſides the conſiderable ſavings ariſing by theſe acts of ſtate-bankruptcy, they had reſources of credit among the merchants of Holland, who beheld the ſucceſs of Great Britain with a jealous eye; and were moreover inflamed againſt her, with the moſt rancorous reſentment, on account of the captures which had been made of their Weſt India ſhips by the Engliſh cruiſers.

In the month of February, the merchants of Amſterdam having received advice that the cargoes of their Weſt India ſhips, detained by the Engliſh, would, by the Britiſh courts of judicature, be declared lawful prizes, as being French property, ſent a deputation with a petition to the States-general, intreating them to uſe their interceſſion with the court of London, repreſenting the impoſſibility of furniſhing the proofs required, in ſo ſhort a time as that preſcribed by the Britiſh admiralty; and that, as the iſland of St. Euſtatia had but one road, and there was no other way of taking in cargoes, but that of overſchippen *, to which the Engliſh had objected, a condemnation of theſe ſhips, as legal prizes, would give the finiſhing ſtroke to the trade of the colony. Whatever remonſtrances the States-general might have made on this ſubject, to the miniſtry of Great Britain, they had no influence upon the proceedings of the court of admiralty, which continued to condemn the cargoes of the Dutch ſhips, as often as they were proved to be French property; and this reſolute uniformity, in a little time, intimidated the ſubjects of Holland from perſevering in this illicit branch of commerce. The enemies of England in that republic, however, had ſo far prevailed, that, in the beginning of the year, the ſtates of Holland had paſſed a formal reſolution to equip five and twenty ſhips of war; and orders were immediately diſpatched to the officers of the admiralty, to complete the armament with all poſſible expedition.

In the month of April, the States-general ſent

over to London three miniſters extraordinary, to make repreſentations, and remove, if poſſible, the cauſes of miſunderſtanding that had ariſen between Great Britain and the United Provinces. They delivered their credentials to the king, with a formal harangue, importing, that his majeſty would ſee, by the contents of the letter they had the honour to preſent, how ardently their High Mightineſſes deſired to cultivate the ſincere friendſhip which had ſo long ſubſiſted between the two nations, ſo neceſſary for their common welfare and preſervation: that they earneſtly wiſhed they might be happy enough to remove thoſe difficulties which had for ſome time ſtruck at this friendſhip, and cauſed ſo much prejudice to the principal ſubjects of the republic; who, by the commerce they carried on, conſtituted its greateſt ſtrength, and chief ſupport; that their whole confidence was placed in his majeſty's equity, for which the republic had the higheſt regard; and in the good will he had always expreſſed toward a ſtate, which, on all occaſions, had intereſted itſelf in promoting his glory; a ſtate which was the guardian of the precious truſt bequeathed by a princeſs ſo dear to his affection: that they humbly preſumed to flatter themſelves, that his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to liſten to their juſt demands: and that they, for their part, ſhould endeavour, during the courſe of their miniſtry, to merit his approbation, in ſtrengthening the bonds by which the two nations ought to be for ever united.

In anſwer to this oration, the king aſſured them, that he had always regarded their High Mightineſſes as his beſt friends: that, if difficulties had ariſen concerning trade, they ought to be conſidered as the conſequences of a burthenſome war, which he was obliged to wage with France: and he deſired they would aſſure their High Mightineſſes, that he ſhould ſtudiouſly endeavour to remove the obſtacles in queſtion; and expreſſed his ſatisfaction, that they (the deputies) were come over with the ſame diſpoſition.

What effect theſe repreſentations had upon the miniſtry of Great Britain does not appear: but, in all probability, the ſubjects of Holland were by no means pleaſed with the ſucceſs of their negociation; for they murmured againſt the Engliſh nation without ceaſing. They threatened and complained by turns, and eagerly laid hold of every opportunity to diſplay their partiality in favour of the enemies of Great Britain.

In the month of September, major general York, the Britiſh miniſter at the Hague, delivered a memorial to the States-general repreſenting, that the merchants of Holland carried on a contraband trade in favour of France, by tranſporting cannon and warlike ſtores, from the Baltic to Holland, in Dutch bottoms, under the borrowed names of private perſons; and then conveyed them by the inland rivers and canals, or through the Dutch fortreſſes to Dunkirk and other places of France; that he hoped the king his maſter would be made eaſy on that head, by their putting an immediate ſtop to ſuch practices, ſo repugnant to the connections ſubſiſting by treaty, between Great Britain and the United Provinces, as well as to every idea of neutrality: that the attention, which his majeſty had lately given to their repreſentations, againſt the exceſſes of the Engliſh privateers, by procuring an act of parliament, which laid them under proper reſtrictions, gave him a good title to the ſame regard on the part of thir High Mightineſſes: that their trading towns felt the good effects of theſe reſtrictions; and that the freedom of navigation, which their ſubjects enjoyed amidſt the troubles and diſtractions of Europe, had conſiderably augmented ther commerce: that ſome return ought to be made to ſuch ſolid proofs of the king's friendſhip and moderation; at leaſt, the merchants, who were ſo ready to complain of England, ought not to be countenanced in exceſſes which would have juſtified the moſt rigorous examination of their conduct: that, during the courſe of the preſent war, the king had ſeveral times applied to their High Mightineſſes, and to their miniſters, on the liberty they had given to carry ſtores through the fortreſſes of the republic for the uſe of France, to invade the Britiſh dominions; and though his majeſty had paſſed over in ſilence many of theſe inſtances of complaiſance to his enemy, he was no leſs ſenſible of the injury; but he choſe rather to be a ſufferer himſelf, than to encreaſe the embarraſſment of his neighbours, or extend the flames of war: that even the court of Vienna had, upon more than one occaſion, employed its intereſt with their High Mightineſſes, and lent its name to obtain paſſes for warlike ſtores and proviſions for the French troops, under colour of the Barrier-Treaty, which it no longer obſerved; nay, after having put France in poſſeſſion of Oſtend and Nieuport, in manifeſt violation of that treaty, and without any regard to the right which they and the king his maſter had acquired in that treaty, at the expence of ſo much blood and treaſure.

This memorial ſeems to have made ſome impreſſion on the States-general, as they ſcrupled to allow the artillery and ſtores belonging to the French king to be removed from Amſterdam: but theſe ſcruples vaniſhed entirely on the receipt of a counter-memorial preſented by the count d'Affry, the French ambaſſador, who mingled ſome effectual threats with his expoſtulation. He ſaid, that during the whole courſe of the war, the French king had required nothing from their friendſhip that was inconſiſtent with the ſtricteſt impartiality; and if he had deviated from the engagements ſubſiſting between him and the republic, it was only by granting the moſt eſſential and lucrative favours to the ſubjects of their High Mightineſſes: that the Engliſh, notwithſtanding the inſolence of their behaviour to the republic, had derived, on many occaſions, aſſiſtance from the protection their effects had found in the territories of the United Provinces: that the artillery, ſtores, and ammunition belonging to Weſſel were depoſited in their territories, which the Hanoverian army in paſſing the Rhine had very little reſpected: that when they repaſſed that river, they had no other way of ſaving their ſick and wounded from the hands of the French, than by embarking them in boats, and conveying them to places where the French left them unmoleſted, actuated by their reſpect for the neutrality of the republic: that part of their magazines was ſtill depoſited in the towns of the United Provinces; where alſo the enemies of France had purchaſed and contracted for very conſiderable quantities of gun-powder: that tho' theſe and ſeveral other circumſtances might have been made the ſubject of the juſteſt complaints, the king of France did not think it proper to require, that the freedom and independency of the ſubjects of the republic ſhould be reſtrained in branches of commerce that were not inconſiſtent with its neutrality, perſuaded that the faith of an engagement ought to be inviolably preſerved, though attended with ſome accidental and tranſient diſadvantages: that the king, his maſter, had ordered the generals of his army carefully to avoid encroaching on the territory of the public, and transferring thither the theatre of the war, when his enemies retreated that way before they were forced to repaſs the Rhine: that after ſuch unqueſtionable marks of regard, the king would have the juſteſt ground of complaint, if, contrary to expectation, he ſhould hear that the artillery and ſtores belonging to him were detained at Amſterdam: that ſuch detention would be conſtrued as a violation of the neutrality; and he, therefore, demanded, in the name of the king his maſter, that the artillery and ſtores ſhould be, without delay, forwarded to Flanders by the canals of Amſterdam and the inland navigation. This laſt argument was ſo concluſive, that they immediately granted the neceſſary paſſports, in conſequence of which the cannon were conveyed to the Auſtrian Netherlands.

The powers in the ſouthern parts of Europe were ſo much engroſſed with their own concerns, that they had neither leiſure nor inclination to intereſt themſelves in the quarrels of the more northern princes. The king of Spain, naturally of a melancholy complexion, and delicate conſtitution, was ſo deeply affected for the loſs of his queen, who died in the courſe of the preceding year, that he renounced all company, neglected all buſineſs, and immured himſelf in a chamber at Villa Vicioſa, where he gave a looſe to the moſt extravagant ſorrow. He abſtained from food and reſt until his ſtrength was quite exhauſted. He would neither ſhift himſelf, nor allow his beard to be ſhaved: he rejected all attempts of conſolation, and remained deaf to the moſt earneſt and reſpectful remonſtrances of thoſe who had a right to tender their advice.

In this caſe, the affliction of the mind muſt have been augmented by ſome peculiarity in the conſtitution. He inherited a melancholy taint from his father, and this ſeems to have been dreaded as a family diſeaſe; for the infant Don Lewis, who likewiſe reſided at the palace of Villa Vicioſa, was obliged to amuſe himſelf with hunting, and other diverſions, to prevent his being infected with the king's diſorder, which continued to gain ground, notwithſtanding all the efforts of medicine. The Spaniſh nation, naturally ſuperſtitious, had recourſe to ſaints and relicts; but theſe ſeemed to pay no regard to their prayers. The king, however, in the midſt of all his diſtreſs, was perſuaded to make his will, which was written by the count de Valparaiſo, and ſigned by the duke of Bejar, high chancellor of the kingdom. The violence of his grief, and the mortifications he underwent, ſoon produced an incurable malady, under which he languiſhed from the month of September in the preceding year, till the tenth of Auguſt in the preſent, when he expired. In his will he had appointed his brother Don Carlos, king of Naples, ſucceſſor to the crown of Spain; and nominated the queen-dowager as regent of the kingdom, until that prince ſhould arrive. Acordingly ſhe aſſumed the reins of government, and gave directions for the funeral of the deceaſed king, who was interred with great pomp in the church belonging to the convent of the viſitation at Madrid.

As the death of this prince had been long expected, the politicians of Europe had univerſally prognoſticated that his demiſe would be attended with great commotions in Italy. It had been agreed among the ſubſcribing powers to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, that in caſe Don Carlos ſhould be advanced in the courſe of ſucceſſion to the throne of Spain, his brother Don Philip ſhould ſucceed him on the throne of Naples; and the dutchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guaſtalla, which now conſtituted his eſtabliſhment, ſhould revert to the houſe of Auſtria. The king of Naples had never acceded to this article, therefore he payed no regard to it on the death of his elder brother; but retained both kingdoms without minding the claims of the empreſs-queen, who, he knew, was at that time in no condition to make good her pretenſions. Thus the German war proved a circumſtance very favourable to his intereſt and ambition.

Before he ſet out for Spain, however, he took ſome extraordinary ſteps, which evinced him a ſound politician and ſagacious legiſlator. His eldeſt ſon Don Philip, who had now attained the thirteenth year of his age, being found in a ſtate of incurable idiotiſm*, he wiſely and reſolutely removed

* Abſtract of the report made to his Catholic majeſty by the phyſicians appointed to examine the prince royal, his eldeſt ſon, in conſequence of which his royal highneſs has been declared incapable of ſucceeding to the throne of Spain. Tranſlated from the original, publiſhed at Naples, September 27.

1. Though his royal highneſs Don Philip is 13 years old, he is low of ſtature; and yet the king his father, and the queen his mother, are both of a very proper height.

2. His royal highneſs has ſome contraction in his joints, though he can readily move, and make uſe of them on all occaſions.

3. His royal highneſs is apt to ſtoop and to hold down his head, as people of weak eyes often do.

4. The prince moſt evidently ſquints, and his eyes frequently water, and are gummy, particularly his left eye; though we cannot ſay he is blind, but are rather certain of the contrary, as his royal highneſs can without doubt diſtinguiſh objects, both as to their colour and ſituation.

5. In his natural functions, and the moſt common ſenſations, he is ſometimes indifferent to things that are convenient for him, and at other times is too warm and impetuous. In general, his paſſions are not reſtrained by reaſon.

6. The prince has an obſtinate averſion to ſome kind of common food, ſuch as fruits, ſweet-meats, &c.

7. All ſorts of noiſe or ſound diſturbs or diſconcerts him; and it has the ſame effect whether it be ſoft and harmonious, or harſh and diſagreeable.

8. The impreſſion that he receives from pain or pleaſure, are neither ſtrong nor laſting, and he is utterly unacquainted with all the punctilios of politeneſs and good breeding.

9. As to facts and places, he ſometimes remembers them, and ſometimes not; but he ſeems not to have the leaſt ideas of the myſteries of our holy religion.

10. He delights in childiſh amuſements; and thoſe which are moſt boiſterous pleaſe him beſt. He is continually changing them, and ſhifting from one thing to another.

him from the ſucceſſion, without any regard to the pretended right of primogeniture, by a ſolemn act of abdication, and ſettlement of the crown of the Two Sicilies in favour of his third ſon, Don Ferdinand. In this extraordinary act he obſerves, that, according to the ſpirit of the treaties of this age, Europe required that the ſovereignty of Spain ſhould be ſeparated from that of Italy, when ſuch a ſeparation could be effected without tranſgreſſing the rules of juſtice: that the unfortunate prince-royal having been deſtitute of reaſon and reflection ever ſince his infancy, and no hope remaining that he could ever acquire the uſe of theſe faculties, he could not think of appointing him to the ſucceſſion, how agreeable ſoever ſuch a diſpoſition might be to nature and his paternal affection: he was therefore conſtrained, by the Divine Will, to ſet him aſide, in favour of his third ſon Ferdinand, whoſe minority obliged him to veſt the management of theſe realms in a regency, which he accordingly appointed, after having previouſly declared his ſon Ferdinand from that time emancipated, and freed not only from obedience to his paternal power, but even from all ſubmiſſion to his ſupreme and ſovereign authority. He then ordained, that the minority of the princes ſucceeding to the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, ſhould expire with the fifteenth year of their age, when they ſhould act as ſovereigns, and have the intire power of the adminiſtration. He next eſtabliſhed and explained the order of ſucceſſion in the male and female line; on condition that the monarchy of Spain ſhould never be united with the kingdoms of the Two Sicilies. Finally, he transferred and made over to the ſaid Don Ferdinand theſe kingdoms, with all that he poſſeſſed in Italy; and this ordinance, ſigned and ſealed by himſelf and the infant Don Ferdinand, and counterſigned by the counſellors and ſecretary of ſtate, in quality of members of the regency, received all the forms of authenticity that could render it valid.

Don Carlos having taken theſe precautions for his third ſon, whom he left king of Naples, embarked with the reſt of his family on board a ſquadron of Spaniſh ſhips, which conveyed him to Barcelona. There he landed in the month of October, and proceeded to Madrid, where, as king of Spain, he was received amidſt the acclamations of his people. He began his reign like a wiſe wiſe prince, by regulating the interior œconomy of his kingdom; by retaining the miniſtry under whoſe auſpice the happineſs and commerce of his people had been extended; and with reſpect to the belligerant powers, by ſcrupulouſly adhering to that neutrality from whence theſe advantages were in a great meaſure derived.

The attention of his Portugueſe majeſty was engroſſed by a ſpecies of employment of a far leſs pleaſing and agreeable nature; namely, by the trial and puniſhment of thoſe conſpirators, who had made ſuch a deſperate attempt to deprive him of his life. Among theſe were numbered ſome of the firſt noblemen of the kingdom, irritated by diſappointed ambition, inflamed by bigotry, and exaſperated by revenge. The principal conſpirator, Don Joſeph Maſcarenhas and Lencaſtre, duke of Aveiro, marquis of Torres Novas, and conde of Santa Cruz, was hereditary lord-ſteward of the king's houſhold, and preſident of the palace court, or laſt tribunal of appeal in the kingdom: ſo that he poſſeſſed the firſt office in the palace, and the ſecond of the realm. Franciſco de Aſſiz, marquis of Tavora, conde of St. John and Alvor, was general of the horſe, and head of the third noble houſe of the Tavoras, the moſt illuſtrious family in the kingdom, deriving their origin from the ancient kings of Leon: he married his own kinſwoman, who was marchioneſs of Tavora in her own right, and by this marriage acquired the marquiſate. Louis Bernardo de Tavora was their eldeſt ſon, who, by virtue of a diſpenſation from the pope, had eſpouſed his own aunt, Donna Thereſa de Tavora. Joſeph Maria de Tavora was alſo involved in the guilt of his parents. The third principal concerned was Don Jeronymo de Attaide, conde of Attouguia, himſelf a relation and married to the eldeſt daughter of the marquis of Tavora. The characters of all thoſe perſonages were unblemiſhed and reſpectable, until this machination was detected.

In the courſe of inveſtigating this dark affair, it appeared that the Duke de Aveiro had conceived a perſonal hatred to the king, who had diſappointed him in a projected match between his ſon and a ſiſter of the duke of Cadaval, a minor, and prevented his obtaining ſome commanderies which the late duke of Aveiro had poſſeſſed; that this nobleman, being determined to gratify his revenge againſt the perſon of his ſovereign, had exerted all his influence and addreſs in procuring the aſſiſtance of the malecontents: that, with this view, he had reconciled himſelf to the Jeſuits, with whom he had been formerly at variance, knowing they were at this time implacably incenſed againſt the king, who had diſmiſſed them from their office of penitentiaries at court, and branded them with other marks of diſgrace, on account of their illegal and rebellious practices in South America: that the duke had, moreover, inſinuated himſelf into the confidence of the marchioneſs of Tavora, notwithſtanding an inveterate rivalſhip of pride and ambition, which had long ſubſiſted between the two families: that her reſentment againſt the king was inflamed by the mortification of her pride in repeated repulſes, when ſhe ſolicited the title of duke for her huſband: that her paſſions were artfully fomented and managed by the Jeſuits, to whom ſhe had reſigned the government of her conſcience; and they had perſuaded her, that it would be a meritorious action to take away the life of a prince who was an enemy to the church, and a tyrant to his people: that ſhe, being reconciled to the ſcheme of aſſaſſination, had exerted her influence in ſuch a manner, as to inveigle her huſband, her ſons, and ſon-in-law, into the ſame infamous deſign; and yet this lady had been always remarkable for her piety, affability, and ſweetneſs of diſpoſition: that many conſultations were held by the conſpirators at the college of the Jeſuits, St. Antao and St. Roque, as well as at the houſe of the duke and marquis: at laſt they reſolved, that the king ſhould be aſſaſſinated; and employed two ruffians, called Antonio Alvarez and Joſeph Policarpio, for the execution of this deſign, the miſcarriage of which we have related among the tranſactions of the preceding year.

In the beginning of January, before the circumſtances of the conſpiracy were known, the counts de Oberos and de Rebeira Grande were impriſoned in the caſtle of St. Julian, on a ſuſpicion ariſing from their freedom of ſpeech. The dutcheſs of Aveiro, the counteſs of Attouguia, and the marchioneſs of Alorna, with their children, were ſent to different nunneries; and eight Jeſuits were taken into cuſtody. A council being appointed for the trial of the priſoners, the particulars we have related were brought to light by the torture; and ſentence of death was pronounced and executed upon the convicted criminals. Eight wheels were fixed upon a ſcaffold, raiſed in the ſquare oppoſite to the houſe where the priſoners had been confined, and the thirteenth day of January was fixed for the day of execution. Antonio Alvarez Ferreira, one of the aſſaſſins who fired into the king's equipage, was fixed to a ſtake at one corner of the ſcaffold; and at the other was placed the effigies of his accomplice, Joſeph Policarpio de Azevedos, who had made his eſcape. The marchioneſs of Tavora, being brought upon the ſcaffold between eight and nine in the morning, was, in compliment to her ſex, beheaded at one ſtroke, and then covered with a linen cloth. Her two ſons, and her ſon-in law the count of Attouguia, with three ſervants of the duke de Aveiro, were firſt ſtrangled at one ſtake, and afterwards broke upon wheels, where their bodies remained covered; but the duke and the marquis, as chiefs of the conſpiracy, were broke alive, and underwent the moſt excruciating torments.

The laſt that ſuffered was the aſſaſſin Alvarez, who being condemned to be burnt alive, the combuſtibles, which had been placed under the ſcaffold, were ſet on fire, the whole machine with their bodies conſumed to aſhes, and theſe aſhes thrown into the ſea. The eſtates of the three unfortunate noblemen were confiſcated, and their dwelling-houſes razed to the ground. The name of Tavora was ſuppreſſed for ever by a public decree; but that of Maſcarenha ſpared, becauſe the duke de Aveiro was but a younger branch of the family. A reward of ten thouſand crowns was offered to any perſon who ſhould apprehend the aſſaſſin who had eſcaped; then the embargo was taken off the ſhipping. The king and royal family aſſiſted at a public Te Deum, ſung in the chapel of Noſſa Senhora de Livramento; on which occaſion the king, for the ſatisfaction of his people, waved his handkerchief with both hands, to ſhew he was not maimed by the wounds he had received.

Nor were the Portugueſe miniſtry ſatisfied with theſe examples of juſtice. Without waiting for a bull from the pope, they ſequeſtered all the eſtates and effects of the jeſuits in that kingdom, which amounted to conſiderable ſums, and reduced the individuals of the ſociety to a very ſcanty allowance. Complaints of their conduct having been made to the pope, he appointed a congregation to examine into the affairs of the jeſuits in Portugal. In the mean time, the court of Liſbon ordered a conſiderable number of them to be embarked for Italy, and reſolved that no jeſuit ſhould hereafter reſide within its realms. When theſe tranſports arrived at Civita Vecchia, they were, by the pope's order, lodged in the Dominican and Capuchin convents of that city, until proper houſes could be prepared for their reception at Tivoli and Freſcati. The moſt guilty of them, however, were detained cloſe priſoners in Portugal.

From this retroſpective view of the ſituation and complexion of the different courts of Europe, let us now turn our eyes to thoſe operations of the war in which Great Britain and France were more peculiarly intereſted as principals. And here I ſhall deviate a little from my uſual method of arrangement, by particularizing the moſt remarkable captures that were made upon the enemy by ſingle ſhips during the courſe of this year, previous to my reſuming the hiſtory of the more capital military tranſactions between the two nations; a deviation I thought neceſſary to adopt in this place, to prevent any interruption in the principal narrative.

In the month of February a French privateer belonging to Granville, called the Marquis de Marigny, having on board near two hundred men, and mounted with twenty cannon, was taken by captain Parker, commander of his majeſty's ſhip the Montague, who likewiſe made prize of a ſmaller armed veſſel, from Dunkirk, of eight cannon and ſixty men. About the ſame period captain Graves, of the Unicorn, brought in the Moras privateer of St. Malo, carrying two hundred men and twenty-two cannon. Two large merchant ſhips, loaded on the French king's account, for Martinique, with proviſion, cloathing and arms, for the troops on that iſland, were taken by captain Lendrick, commander of the Brilliant; and an Engliſh tranſport from St. John's, having four hundred French priſoners on board, periſhed near the Weſtern Iſlands. Within the circle of the ſame month a large French ſhip from St Domingo, richly laden, fell in with the Favourite ſhip of war, and was carried into Gibraltar.

In the month of February captain Hood, of his majeſty's frigate the Veſtal, belonging to a ſmall ſquadron commanded by admiral Holmes, who had ſailed for the Weſt Indies in January, being advanced a conſiderable way a-head of the fleet, deſcried and gave chace to a ſail, which proved to be a French frigate called the Bellona, of two hundred and twenty men, and thirty two great guns, commanded by the count de Beauhonoire. Captain Hood having made a ſignal to the admiral, continued the chace until he advanced within half muſket-ſhot of the enemy, and then poured in a broadſide, which was immediately returned. The engagement, thus begun, was maintained with great vigour on both ſides for the ſpace of four hours: at the expiration of which the Bellona ſtruck, after having loſt all her maſts and rigging, together with about forty men killed in the action: nor was the victor in a much better condition; thirty men were killed and wounded on board of the Veſtal. Immediately after the enemy ſubmitted, all her rigging being deſtroyed by the ſhot, the top-maſt fell overboard; and ſhe was otherwiſe ſo damaged that ſhe could not proceed on her voyage. Captain Hood therefore conducted his prize to Spithead, and afterwards met with a gracious reception from his majeſty, on account of the valour and conduct he had manifeſted on this occaſion. The Bellona had ſailed in January from the iſland of Martinique, along with the Floriſſant, and another French frigate, from which ſhe had been ſeparated in the paſſage.

Immediately after this exploit, captain Elliot, of the Æolus frigate, accompanied by the Iſis, made made prize of a French ſhip, the Mignonne, of twenty guns, and one hundred and forty men. She was one of four frigates employed as convoy to a large fleet of merchant ſhips, near the iſland of Rhée.

In the month of March the Engliſh frigates the Southampton and Melampe, commanded by the captains Gilchriſt and Hotham, being at ſea to the northward on a cruize, fell in with the Danae, a French ſhip of forty cannon, and three hundred and thirty men, which was attacked by captain Hotham in a ſhip of half the force, who maintained the battle a conſiderable time with admirable gallantry before his conſort could come to his aſſiſtance. As they fought in the dark, captain Gilchriſt was obliged to lie by for ſome time, becauſe he could not diſtinguiſh the one from the other; but no ſooner did the day appear than he bore down upon the Danae with his uſual impetuoſity, and ſoon compelled her to ſurrender. She did not ſtrike, however, until thirty or forty of her men were ſlain; and the gallant captain Gilchriſt had received a grape-ſhot in his ſhoulder, which though it did not deprive him of life, yet rendered him incapable of future ſervice: a misfortune the more to be lamented, as it happened to a brave officer, in the vigour of his age, and in the midſt of a ſanguinary war, which might have afforded him many other opportunities of ſignalizing his courage for the honour and advantage of his country.

Another remarkable exploit was about the ſame time performed by captain Barrington, commander of the ſhip Achilles, mounted with ſixty cannon, who, to the weſtward of Cape Finiſterre, encountered a French ſhip of equal force, called the Count de St. Florentin, bound from Cape François, on the iſland of Hiſpaniola, to Rochefort, under the command of the ſieur de Montay, who was obliged to ſtrike, after a cloſe and obſtinate engagement, in which he himſelf was mortally wounded, a great number of his men ſlain, and his ſhip ſo much ſhattered, that ſhe was with difficulty brought into Falmouth. Captain Barrington obtained the victory at the expence of about twenty-five men, killed and wounded, and all his rigging, which the enemy's ſhot had rendered uſeleſs.

Two ſmall privateers from Dunkirk were alſo taken, one called the Marquis de Bareil, by the Brilliant, which carried her into Kinſale in Ireland; the other called the Carilloneur, which ſtruck to the Grace cutter, aſſiſted by the boats of the ſhip Rocheſter, commanded by captain Duff, who ſent her into the Downs.

About the latter end of March captain Falkner, in the ſhip Windſor, of ſixty guns, cruiſing to the weſtward, diſcovered four large ſhips to leeward, which, when he drew near them, formed the line of battle a-head, in order to give him a warm reception. He accordingly cloſed with the ſternmoſt ſhip, which ſuſtained his fire about an hour; then the other three bearing away with all the ſail they could carry, ſhe ſtruck her colours, and was conducted to Liſbon. She proved to be the Duc de Chartres, pierced for ſixty cannon, though at that time carrying no more than four and twenty, with a complement of three hundred men, about thirty of whom were killed in the action. She belonged, with the other three that eſcaped, to the French Eaſt India company, was loaded with gun-powder and naval ſtores, and bound for Pondicherry.

Two privateers, called Chaſſeur and Le Conquerant, the one from Dunkirk, the other from Cherburg, were taken and carried into Plymouth by captain Hughs, of his majeſty's frigate the Tamer. A third, called the Diſpatch, from Morlaix, was brought into Penzance by the Diligence ſloop, under the command of captain Eaſtwood. A fourth, called the Baſque, from Bayonne, furniſhed with twenty-two guns and above two hundred men, fell into the hands of captain Parker, of the Brilliant, who conveyed her into Plymouth. Captain Antrobus, of the Surprize, took the Vieux, a privateer of Bourdeaux; and a fifth, from Dunkirk, ſtruck to captain Knight, of the Liverpool, off Yarmouth.

In the month of May a French frigate, called the Arethuſa, mounted with thirty-two cannon, manned with a large complement of hands, under the command of the marquis de Vaudreuil, ſubmitted to two Britiſh frigates, the Venus and the Thames, commanded by the captains Harriſon and Colby, after a warm engagement, in which ſixty men were killed and wounded on the ſide of the enemy. In the beginning of June an armed ſhip, belonging to Dunkirk, was brought into the Downs by captain Angel, of the Stag; and a privateer of force, called the Counteſs de la Serre, was attacked and taken, after an obſtinate action, by captain Moore, of his majeſty's ſhip the Adventure.

Several armed ſhips of the enemy and valuable prizes were taken in the Weſt Indies; particularly two French frigates, and two Dutch ſhips with French commodities, all richly laden, by ſome of the ſhips of the ſquadron which vice-admiral Cotes commanded in the Jamaica ſtation. A fifth, called the Velour, from St. Domingo, with a valuable cargo on board, being provided with twenty cannon, and above one hundred men, fell in with the Favourite ſloop of war, under the command of captain Edwards, who, after an obſtinate diſpute, carried her in triumph to Gibraltar.

At St. Chriſtopher's in the Weſt Indies, captain Collingwood, commander of the king's ſhip the Creſcent, attacked two French frigates, the Amethyſte and Berkeley; the former of which eſcaped, after a warm engagement, in which the Creſcent's rigging was ſo much ſhattered that ſhe could not purſue; but the other was taken, and conducted into the harbour of Baſſeterre.

Notwithſtanding the vigilance and courage of the Engliſh cruizers in thoſe ſeas, the French privateers ſwarmed to ſuch a degree, that in the courſe of this year they took above two hundred ſail of Britiſh ſhips, valued at ſix hundred thouſand pounds ſterling.

On the tenth of October the Hercules ſhip of war, mounted with ſeventy-four guns, under the command of captain Porter, cruiſing in the Chops of the Channel, diſcovered to windward a large ſhip, which proved to be the Floriſſant, of the ſame force with the Hercules. Her commander, obſerving the Engliſh ſhip giving chace, did not ſeem to decline the action, but bore down in an oblique direction, and the engagement began with great fury. In a little time the Hercules, having loſt her topmaſt, and all her rigging being ſhot away, away, the enemy took advantage of this diſaſter, made the beſt of his way, and was purſued till eight o'clock next morning, when he eſcaped behind the iſle of Oleron. Captain Porter had one man killed, was himſelf wounded in the head with a grapeſhot, and loſt the uſe of one leg in the engagement.

Having thus given an account of all the remarkable captures and exploits that were made and performed ſince the commencement of the preſent year, I ſhall now proceed to deſcribe the actions that were at the ſame period atchieved by the different ſquadrons that conſtituted the naval power of Great Britain. Intelligence having been received that the enemy had projected an invaſion upon ſome of the Britiſh territories, and that a number of flat-bottomed boats were aſſembled at Havre de Grace for the purpoſe of tranſporting troops, rear-admiral Rodney was, in the beginning of July, detached with a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips and bombs to annoy and overawe that part of the coaſt of France. He accordingly arrived in the road of Havre, and made diſpoſitions to execute his orders. The bomb-veſſels being moored in the narrow channel of the river leading to Honfleur, began to throw their ſhells, and continued the bombardment for fifty-two hours without intermiſſion, during which a numerous body of French forces was employed in forming intrenchments, erecting new batteries, and firing both with ſhot and ſhells upon the aſſailants. The town was ſet on fire in ſeveral places, and burned with great violence; ſome of the boats were overturned, and a few of them reduced to aſhes, while the inhabitants abandoned the place in the utmoſt conſternation.

The honour of the Britiſh flag was ſtill more effectually aſſerted by the gallant admiral Boſcawen, who, as I have already remarked, was entruſted with the conduct of a ſquadron in the Mediterranean. It muſt be owned, however, that his firſt attempt was far from being ſucceſsful. Having in vain diſplayed the Britiſh flag in ſight of Toulon, by way of defiance to the French fleet that there rode at anchor, he ordered three ſhips of the line, commanded by the captains Smith, Harland, and Barker, to advance and burn two ſhips that lay cloſe to the mouth of the harbour. They accordingly approached with great intrepidity, and were warmly received by a good number of batteries, which had before eſcaped their notice. Two ſmall forts they attempted to deſtroy, and cannonaded for ſome time with great fury; but being overpowered by a ſuperior fire, and the wind ſuddenly falling, they ſuſtained conſiderable damage, and were towed off with great difficulty, in a very ſhattered condition. The admiral ſeeing three of his beſt ſhips ſo roughly handled in this enterprize, returned to Gibraltar in order to refit; and M. de la Clue, commander of the French ſquadron at Toulon, ſeized this opportunity of ſailing, in hope of paſſing the Streights mouth unobſerved, his fleet conſiſting of twelve large ſhips and three frigates.

Admiral Boſcawen, who commanded fourteen ſail of the line, with two frigates, and as many fire-ſhips, having repaired his ſquadron, detached one frigate to cruize off Malaga, and another to hover between Eſtepona and Ceuta point; with a view to keep a good look-out, and give timely notice in caſe the enemy ſhould approach. On the ſeventeenth day of Auguſt, at eight in the evening, the Gibraltar frigate made a ſignal that fourteen ſail appeared on the Barbary ſhore to the eaſtward of Ceuta; upon which the Engliſh admiral immediately weighed anchor and put to ſea: at day-light he perceived ſeven large ſhips lying to; but when the Engliſh ſquadron forbore to anſwer their ſignal, they diſcovered their miſtake, ſet all their ſail and made the beſt of their way. This was the greater part of the French ſquadron commanded by M. de la Clue, from whom five of his large ſhips and three frigates had ſeparated in the night. Even now perhaps he might have eſcaped, had he not been obliged to wait for the Souveraine, which was a heavy ſailer.

At noon the wind, which had blown a freſh gale, ſuddenly ſubſided; and although admiral Boſcawen had made ſignal to chace and engage in a line of battle a-head, it was not till half an hour after two that ſome of his headmoſt ſhips could overtake the rear of the enemy: which, though greatly overmatched in numbers, fought with uncommon bravery. The Engliſh admiral, without waiting to return the fire of the ſternmoſt, which he received as he paſſed, uſed all his endeavours to come up with the Ocean, which Mr. de la Clue commanded in perſon; and about four o'clock in the afternoon running athwart her hawſe, he poured into her a furious broadſide: thus the engagement began with equal vigour on both ſides. This diſpute however was of ſhort duration; in about half an hour admiral Boſcawen's mizen-maſt and topſail-yards were ſhot away; and the enemy hoiſted all the ſail they could carry. Mr. Boſcawen having ſhifted his flag from the Namur to the Newark, joined ſome other ſhips in attacking the Centaur of ſeventy-four cannon, which being thus overpowered, was obliged to ſubmit.

The Britiſh admiral purſued them all night, during which the Souveraine and the Guerrier altered their courſe, and deſerted their commander. At day-break, Mr. de la Clue, whoſe left leg had been broke in the engagement, perceiving the Engliſh ſquadron crowding all their ſails in order to overtake him, and finding himſelf on the coaſt of Portugal, determined to burn his ſhips, rather than they ſhould fall into the hands of the enemy. The Ocean was run aſhore two leagues from Lagos, near the fort of Almadana, the commander of which fired three ſhots at the Engliſh; another captain of the French ſquadron followed the example of his commander; and both endeavoured to diſembark their men; but the ſea being rough, this proved a very tedious and difficult attempt. The captains of the Temeraire and Modeſte, inſtead of deſtroying their ſhips, anchored as near as they could to the forts Exavier and Lagres, in hope of receiving their protection; but in this hope they were diſappointed. Mr. de la Clue had been landed, and the command of the Ocean devolved upon the count de Carne, who, having ſuſtained one broadſide from the America, ſtruck his colours, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of this noble prize, the beſt ſhip in the French navy, mounted with eighty cannon. Captain Bentley of the Warſpight, who had remarkably diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage during the action of the preceding day, attacked the Temeraire of ſeventy-four guns, and brought her her off with little damage. Vice-admiral Broderick, the ſecond in command, advancing with his diviſion, burned the Redoubtable of ſeventy-four, which was bulged, and abandoned by her men and officers; but they made prize of the Modeſte, carrying ſixty-four guns, which had not been much injured in the engagement.

This victory was obtained by the Engliſh admiral at a very ſmall expence of men; the whole number of the killed and wounded not exceeding two hundred and fifty on board of the Britiſh ſquadron; though the carnage among the enemy muſt have been much more conſiderable, as Mr. de la Clue, in his letter to the French ambaſſador at Liſbon, owns, that on board of his own ſhip the Ocean, one hundred men were killed on the ſpot, and ſeventy dangerouſly wounded: but the moſt ſevere circumſtancce of this diſaſter was the loſs of four capital ſhips, two of which were deſtroyed, and the other two brought in triumph to England, to be numbered among the beſt bottoms of the Britiſh navy. What augmented the good fortune of the victors, was, that not one officer loſt his life in the engagement. Captain Bentley, whom the admiral diſpatched to England, with the tidings of his ſucceſs, met with a gracious reception from the king, who knighted him for his gallantry.

As I intend to bring into one point of view all the naval tranſactions of the year, eſpecially thoſe that happened in the European ſeas, I muſt now, without regarding the order of time, delay the mention of ſome previous events of importance, and record the laſt action at ſea, that in the courſe of this year was performed by the navy of Great Britain. The court of Verſailles, in order to embarraſs the Britiſh miniſtry, and divert their attention from all expeditions to the French coaſt, had in the winter projected a plan for invading ſome part of the Britiſh dominions; and in the beginning of the year had actually begun to make preparations in their different harbours, for carrying this deſign into execution. Even as far back as the latter end of May, meſſages from the king to both houſes of parliament, were delivered by the earl of Holderneſſe and Mr. Pitt, the two ſecretaries of ſtate, importing that his majeſty had received advice of preparations making by the French court, with a deſign to invade Great Britain; that, though perſuaded by the univerſal zeal and affection of his people, any ſuch attempt muſt, under the bleſſing of God, end in the deſtruction of thoſe who engaged in it; yet he apprehended he ſhould not act conſiſtent with that paternal care and concern which he had always ſhewn for the ſafety and preſervation of his ſubjects, if he omitted any means in his power, which might be neceſſary for their defence: he therefore acquainted the parliament with his having received intelligence of the enemy's preparations, to the end that his majeſty might, if he ſhould think proper, in purſuance of the late act of parliament, cauſe the militia, or ſuch part thereof as ſhould be neceſſary, to be drawn out and embodied, in order to march as occaſion ſhould require.

Theſe meſſages were no ſooner read, than each houſe ſeparately reſolved to preſent an addreſs, thanking his majeſty for having imparted this intelligence; aſſuring him that they would with their lives and fortunes ſupport him againſt all attempts whatever: that warmed with affection and zeal for his perſon and government, and animated by indignation at the daring deſigns of an enemy, whoſe fleet had hitherto ſhunned the terror of the Britiſh navy, they would chearfully exert their utmoſt efforts to repel all inſults, and effectually enable their ſovereign, not only to diſappoint the attempts of France, but, by the bleſſing of God, turn them to their own confuſion. The commons at the ſame time reſolved upon another addreſs, deſiring his majeſty would give directions to his lieutenants of the ſeveral counties, ridings, and places within South Britain, to employ their utmoſt diligence and attention in executing the ſeveral acts of parliament relating to the militia.

Theſe and other precautionary ſteps were accordingly taken; but the government wiſely placed their chief dependence upon the ſtrength of the navy, part of which was ſo diſpoſed and ſtationed, as to block up all the harbours of France, in which the enemy were known to make any naval preparations. I have obſerved in what manner rear-admiral Rodney viſited the town and harbour of Havre de Grace, and alarmed that part of the coaſt in ſucceſſive cruiſes: I have alſo given an account of the expedition and victory of admiral Boſcawen over the ſquadron of La Clue, which was fitted out at Toulon, with deſign to aſſiſt in the projected invaſion.

Notwithſtanding this diſaſter, the French miniſtry perſevered in their deſign; towards the execution of which, they had aſſembled another conſiderable fleet, at the harbours of Rochfort, Breſt, and Port Louis, to be commanded by Mr. de Conflans, and reinforced by a numerous body of troops, which were actually drawn together under the Duc d'Aiguillon, at Vannes in Lower Bretagne. Flat-bottomed boats, and tranſports for the purpoſe, were collected in different ports on the coaſt of France; and a ſmall ſquadron was equipped at Dunkirk, under the command of an enterpriſing adventurer, named Thurot, who had, in the courſe of the preceding year, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage and conduct in a large privateer, called the Belleiſle, which had ſcoured the North Seas, taken a number of ſhips, and at one time maintained an obſtinate engagement againſt two Engliſh frigates, which were obliged to deſiſt, after having ſuſtained conſiderable damage.

This man's name became a terror to the trading veſſels of Great Britain; for his valour was not more conſpicuous in battle than his conduct in eluding the purſuit of the Britiſh cruiſers, who were ſucceſſively ſent in queſt of him, through every port of the German ocean and Northern Sea, as far as the iſlands of Orkney. It muſt be acknowledged, likewiſe, for the honour of humanity, and in juſtice to this bold mariner, though deſtitute of the advantages of birth and education, he was eminently diſtinguiſhed by his generoſity and compaſſion to thoſe who had the misfortune to fall under his power; and that his behaviour in every reſpect entitled him to a much more honourable rank in the ſervice of his country. The court of Verſailles were not inſenſible to his merit. He obtained a commiſſion from the French king, and was intruſted with the command of the ſmall armament now fitting out in the harbour of Dunkirk.

The Britiſh government, being timely informed of theſe particulars, took every meaſure that ſagacity could ſuggeſt, or vigour execute, to defeat the purpoſed invaſion. With this view, Thurot's armament at Dunkirk was watched by an Engliſh ſquadron in the Downs, commanded by commodore Boys; the port of Havre was guarded by rear-admiral Rodney; Mr. Boſcawen had been ſtationed off Toulon; and the coaſt of Vannes was ſecured by a ſmall ſquadron detached from Sir Edward Hawke, who had during the whole ſummer blocked up the harbour of Breſt, where Conflans lay with his fleet, in order to be joined by the other diviſions of the armament. Theſe different ſquadrons of the Britiſh navy were connected by a chain of ſeparate cruiſers; ſo that the whole coaſt of France, from Dunkirk to the extremity of Bretagne, might be ſaid to be ſubjected to an actual blockade.

The French miniſtry being thus over-awed, delayed their attempt upon Britain; and the projected invaſion ſeemed to hang in ſuſpence, till the month of Auguſt, in the beginning of which their army in Germany ſuſtained a defeat on the plains of Minden. Their deſigns in that country being baffled by this diſaſter, they ſeemed to convert their chief attention to their ſea armament; the preparations were reſumed with redoubled vigour; and even after the defeat of La Clue, they reſolved to try their fortune in a deſcent. They now propoſed to diſembark a body of troops in Ireland.

Thurot received orders to ſail from Dunkirk with the firſt opportunity, and direct his courſe round the northern parts of Scotland, that he might alarm the coaſt of Ireland, and make a diverſion from that part where Conflans intended to effect a landing. The tranſports and ſhips of war were collected at Breſt and Rochfort, having on board a train of artillery, with ſaddles, and other accoutrements for cavalry, to be mounted in Ireland. A body of French troops, including part of the Iriſh Brigade, was kept in readineſs to embark; and the young pretender, having agreed to the terms propoſed by France, arrived in the neighbourhood of Vannes incognito, in order, once more, to hazard his perſon, and excite a revolt in the dominions of Great-Britain.

The execution of this ſcheme was, however, prevented by the vigilance of Sir Edward Hawke, who blocked up the harbour of Breſt, with a fleet of twenty-three capital ſhips; while another ſquadron of ſmaller ſhips and frigates, under the command of captain Duff, continued to cruiſe along the French coaſt from port L'Orient in Bretagne to the point of St. Gilles in Poitou. At length, however, in the beginning of November, the Britiſh ſquadron commanded by Sir Edward Hawke, Sir Charles Hardy, and rear admiral Geary, were forced from the coaſt of France by ſtreſs of weather, and anchored in Torbay.

The French admiral Conflans ſeized this opportunity of ſailing from Breſt, with one and twenty ſail of the line, and four frigates, in hope of being able to deſtroy the Engliſh ſquadron commanded by captain Duff, before the larger fleet could return from the coaſt of England. Sir Edward Hawke having received intelligence that the French fleet had departed from Breſt, immediately ſtood to ſea, in order to purſue them; and in the mean time, the government iſſued orders for guarding all thoſe parts of the coaſt that were thought the moſt expoſed to a deſcent. The land forces were put in motion, and quartered along the ſhore in Kent and Suſſex; all the ſhips of war in the different harbours, even thoſe that had juſt arrived from America, were ordered to put out to ſea, and every ſtep was taken to diſappoint the deſigns of the enemy.

While theſe meaſures were taken with equal ſpirit and circumſpection, Sir Edward Hawke ſteered his courſe directly for Quiberon, on the coaſt of Bretagne, which he ſuppoſed would be the rendezvous of the French: but notwithſtanding his utmoſt efforts, he was driven by a hard gale conſiderably to the weſtward, where he was joined by two frigates, the Maidſtone and Coventry. Theſe he ordered to keep a-head of the ſquadron. The weather growing more moderate, the former made the ſignal for ſeeing a fleet, on the twentieth day of November, at half an hour paſt eight o'clock in the morning, and in an hour afterwards diſcovered them to be the enemy's ſquadron. They were at that time in chace of captain Duff's ſquadron, which now joined the large fleet, after having been in ſome danger of being taken. Sir Edward Hawke, who, when the Maidſtone gave the firſt notice, had formed the line a-breaſt, now obſerving, that the French admiral endeavoured to eſcape with all the ſail he could croud, threw out a ſignal for ſeven of his ſhips that were neareſt the enemy to chace, and endeavour to detain them, until they could be reinforced by the reſt of the ſquadron, which were ordered to form into a line of battle a-head, as they advanced, that no time might be loſt in the purſuit.

Conſidering the roughneſs of the weather, which was extremely tempeſtuous; the nature of the coaſt, which in this place is ſown thick with ſand banks, ſhoals, rocks, and iſlands, as entirely unknown to the Britiſh ſailors, as they were familiar to the French navigators; the dangers of a ſhort day, dark night, and lee ſhore; it required an uncommon degree of reſolution in the Engliſh admiral to attempt hoſtilities on this occaſion: but Sir Edward Hawke, prompted by the innate bravery of his own heart, animated by a warm love for his country, and well acquainted with the importance of the ſtake on which the ſafety of his country in a great meaſure depended, was determined to run every riſque in endeavouring to fruſtrate at once a boaſted ſcheme projected for the annoyance of his fellow-ſubjects.

With regard to his ſhips of the line, he had but the advantage of one in point of number, and was rather inferior in the article of men and metal; conſequently Mr. de Conflans might have hazarded a fair battle on the open ſea, without any imputation of temerity; but he thought proper to play a more artful game, though it did not ſucceed according to his expectation. He kept his fleet in a body, and retired cloſe in ſhore, with a view to draw the Engliſh ſquadron among the ſhoals and iſlands, on which he hoped they would pay dear for their raſhneſs and impetuoſity, while he and his officers, who were perfectly acquainted with the navigation, could either ſtay, and take advantage of the diſaſter, or if hard preſſed, retire through channels unknown to the Britiſh pilots.

At half an hour after two, the van of the Engliſh fleet began the engagement with the rear of the enemy, in the neighbourhood of Belleiſle. Every ſhip as ſhe advanced poured in a broad ſide on the ſternmoſt of the French, and bore down upon their van, leaving the rear to thoſe that came after. Sir Edward Hawke, in the Royal George of one hundred and ten guns, reſerved his fire in paſſing through the rear of the enemy, and ordered his maſter to bring him along-ſide of the French admiral, who commanded in perſon on board of the Soleil Royal, a ſhip mounted with eighty cannon, and furniſhed with a complement of twelve hundred men.

When the pilot remonſtrated that he could not obey his command, without the moſt imminent riſque of running upon a ſhoal, the gallant Hawke replied, "You have done your duty in ſhewing the danger; now you are to obey my order, and lay me along-ſide the Soleil Royal." His wiſh was gratified: the Royal George ranged up with the French admiral. The Theſée, a French ſeventy-four gun ſhip, generouſly put herſelf between them: Hawke was obliged to beſtow upon her the fire he had reſerved for a greater occaſion, and at one broadſide ſunk her to the bottom. The ſame was the fate of the Superbe, another French ſhip of ſeventy guns.

Notwithſtanding the boiſterous weather, a good number of ſhips on both ſides fought with equal fury and dubious ſucceſs, till about four in the afternoon, when the Formidable ſtruck her colours. The Heros took the ſame ſtep, in token of ſubmiſſion, and dropped anchor; but the wind was ſo high, that no boat could be ſent effectually to ſecure the conqueſt. By this time day-light began to fail, and the greater part of the French fleet eſcaped under cover of the night.

Night approaching, the ſtorm continuing to encreaſe on a lee-ſhore, and the Britiſh ſquadron being ſurrounded by unknown ſhoals and iſlands, Sir Edward Hawke made the ſignal for anchoring to the weſtward of the ſmall iſland Dumet; and here the fleet remained all night, in a very dangerous riding, alarmed by the fury of the tempeſt, and the inceſſant firing of guns of diſtreſs, without knowing whether it proceeded from friend or enemy. The Soleil Royal had, under favour of the night, anchored likewiſe in the midſt of the Britiſh ſquadron; but, at day-break, Mr. de Conflans ordered her cable to be cut, and ſhe drove aſhore to the weſtward of Crozie. The Engliſh admiral immediately made ſignal to the Eſſex to ſlip cable, and purſue her; and, in obeying this order, ſhe ran unfortunately on a ſand-bank, called Lefour, where the Reſolution, another ſhip of the Britiſh ſquadron, was already grounded. Here they were both irretrievably loſt, in ſpite of all the aſſiſtance that could be given: but all their men, and part of their ſtores, were ſaved, and the wreck ſet on fire by order of the admiral. He likewiſe detached the Portland, Chatham, and Vengeance, to deſtroy the Soleil Royal, which was burned by her own people, before the Engliſh ſhips could approach; but they arrived time enough to reduce the Heros to aſhes on the Lefour, where ſhe had been alſo ſtranded; and the Juſte, another of their great ſhips, periſhed in the mouth of the Loire.

The admiral, obſerving ſeven large ſhips of the enemy riding at anchor between Point Penvas and the mouth of the river Vilaine, made the ſignal to weigh, in order to attack them; but the fury of the ſtorm increaſed to ſuch a degree, that he was obliged to remain at anchor, and even order the top-gallant maſts to be ſtruck. In the mean time, the French ſhips being lightened of their cannon, their officers took advantage of the flood, and a more moderate gale under the land, to enter the Vilaine, where they lay within half a mile of the entrance, defended by ſome occaſional batteries erected on the ſhore, and by two large frigates, moored acroſs the mouth of the harbour. There they were effectually protected from any attempts of ſmall veſſels; and as for large ſhips, they could not approach ſo near as to reach them with their metal.

On the whole, this battle, in which a very ſmall number of lives was loſt, may be conſidered as one of the moſt glorious and important actions that ever happened in any war between the two nations: for it not only defeated the projected invaſion, with which the iſland of Great Britain had been ſo long threatened; but it gave the finiſhing blow to the naval power of France, which was thenceforward rendered totally incapable of undertaking any enterprize of importance.

As for the Britiſh admiral, he continued cruiſing off the coaſt of Bretagne for a conſiderable time after the victory he had gained, taking particular care to block up the mouth of the river Vilaine, that the ſeven French ſhips might not eſcape, and join Mr. Conflans, who made ſhift to reach Rochfort with the ſhattered remains of his ſquadron. Sir Edward Hawke, having undergone a long and dangerous conflict with tempeſtuous weather, was at length recalled, and preſented to his ſovereign, who gratified him with a conſiderable penſion, for the courage and conduct he had ſo often and ſo ſignally diſplayed in the ſervice of his country; and his extraordinary merit was afterwards honoured with the ſolemn thanks of the parliament.

The people of France were ſo diſpirited by the diſcomfiture of their army at Minden, and the defeat of their ſquadron at Lagos, that the miniſtry of Verſailles thought proper to conceal the greatneſs of their laſt misfortune under a palliating detail publiſhed in the Gazette of Paris, as a letter from Mr. Conflans to the count de St. Florentin, ſecretary of the marine. In this egregious miſrepreſentation their admiral was made to affirm, that the Britiſh fleet conſiſted of forty ſhips of the line of battle, beſides frigates; that the Soleil Royal had compelled the Royal George to ſheer off; that the ſeven ſhips, which retreated into the river Vilaine, had ſuſtained very little damage, and would be ſoon repaired; and that, by the junction of Bompart's ſquadron, he ſhould be ſoon able to give a good account of the Engliſh admiral. Such were the pitiful ſhifts which the French miniſtry were obliged to employ, in order to ſave themſelves the mortification of confeſſing the irreparable loſs they had ſuffered.

The alarm of the French invaſion, which was thus ſo happily diſconcerted, not only affected the tranquillity of Great Britain, but alſo communicated itſelf to the kingdom of Ireland, where it gave occaſion to ſome public diſorder. In the latter end of of October the two houſes of parliament, having aſſembled at Dublin, received a formal meſſage from the duke of Bedford, lord-lieutenant of that kingdom, importing, that, by a letter from the ſecretary of ſtate, written by his majeſty's expreſs command, it appeared that France, far from reſigning her plan of invaſion, on account of the diſaſter that befel her Toulon ſquadron, was more and more confirmed in her purpoſe, and even inſtigated by deſpair itſelf, to attempt, at all hazards, the only reſource ſhe ſeemed to have left, for thwarting, by a diverſion at home, the meaſures of England abroad, in proſecuting a war which had hitherto opened, in all parts of the world, ſo unfavourable a proſpect to the views of French ambition: that, in caſe the body of French troops, amounting to eighteen thouſand men, under the command of the duc d'Aiguillon, aſſembled at Vannes, where alſo a ſufficient number of tranſports was prepared, ſhould be able to elude the Britiſh ſquadron, Ireland would, in all probability, be one of their chief objects; his grace thought it therefore incumbent upon him, in a matter of ſuch high importance to the welfare of that kingdom, to impart this intelligence to the Iriſh parliament: that his majeſty made no doubt but that the zeal of his faithful Proteſtant ſubjects in that kingdom, had been already ſufficiently quickened by the repeated accounts received of the enemy's dangerous deſigns, and actual preparations, at a vaſt expence, in order to invade the ſeveral parts of the Britiſh dominions: that his grace had received his ſovereign's commands to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to animate and excite his loyal people of Ireland to exert their well-known zeal and ſpirit in ſupport of his majeſty's government, and in defence of all that was dear to them, by timely preparation to reſiſt and fruſtrate any attempts of the enemy to diſturb the quiet, and ſhake the ſecurity of this kingdom: he, therefore, in the ſtrongeſt manner, recommended it to them to manifeſt, upon this occaſion, that zeal for the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, and that affection for his majeſty's perſon and government, by which the parliament of that nation had been ſo often diſtinguiſhed.

This meſſage was no ſooner read, than the houſe of commons unanimouſly reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the lord lieutenant, thanking his grace for the care and concern he had ſhewn for the ſafety of Ireland, in having communicated intelligence of ſo great importance; deſiring him to make uſe of ſuch means as ſhould appear to him the moſt effectual for the ſecurity and defence of the kingdom; and aſſuring him, that the houſe would make good whatever expence ſhould be neceſſarily incurred for that purpoſe.

This intimation, and the ſteps that were taken in conſequence of it, for the defence of Ireland, produced ſuch apprehenſions and diſtraction among the people of that kingdom, as had well nigh proved fatal to the public credit. In the firſt tranſports of popular fear, there was ſuch an extraordinary run upon the banks of Dublin, that ſeveral conſiderable bankers were obliged to ſtop payment; and the circulation was in danger of being entirely ſtagnated, when the lord lieutenant, the members of both houſes of parliament, the lord mayor, aldermen, merchants, and principal traders of Dublin, engaged in an aſſociation to ſupport public credit, by taking the notes of bankers in payment: a reſolution which effectually anſwered the purpoſe intended.

Whatever hopes the court of Verſailles might have conceived, that their invading army would in Ireland be reinforced by a great number of the natives, in all probability their expectations would have been wholly diſappointed, had they even been able to effect a landing; for no ſigns of diſaffection to the reigning family appeared at this juncture. On the contrary, the wealthy individuals of the Romiſh perſuaſion offered voluntarily to furniſh the government with large ſums of money, in caſe of neceſſity, to ſupport the preſent eſtabliſhment againſt all its enemies; and the Roman catholics of the city of Corke, in a body, preſented an addreſs to the lord lieutenant, expreſſing their loyalty in the warmeſt terms of affection. After having congratulated his grace on the unparalleled ſucceſſes which had attended his majeſty's arms, and expreſſed their ſenſe of the king's paternal tenderneſs for his kingdom of Ireland, they acknowledged, with the deepeſt ſenſe of gratitude, that protection and indulgence they had enjoyed under his majeſty's mild and auſpicious reign. They profeſſed the warmeſt indignation at the threatened invaſion of the kingdom by an enemy, who, grown deſperate from repeated defeats, might poſſibly make that attempt as a laſt effort, vainly flattered with the imaginary hope of aſſiſtance in Ireland, from the former attachments of their deluded predeceſſors. They aſſured his grace, in the moſt ſolemn manner, that ſuch ſchemes were altogether inconſiſtent with their principles and intentions: that they would, to the utmoſt exertion of their abilities, with their lives and fortunes, join in the defence and ſupport of his majeſty royal perſon and government againſt all invaders whatſoever: that they ſhould be always ready to concur in ſuch meaſures, and to act ſuch parts, in defence of the kingdom, in common with the reſt of his majeſty's ſubjects, as his grace in his great wiſdom ſhould be pleaſed to appoint; and think themſelves particularly happy to be under the direction and command of ſo known an aſſertor of liberty, ſuch an important and diſtinguiſhed governor. Finally, they expreſſed the moſt earneſt wiſh, that his majeſty's arms might be crowned with ſuch a continuance of ſucceſs, as ſhould enable him to defeat the devices of all his enemies, and obtain a ſpeedy and honourable peace. This loyal addreſs, which was tranſmitted to the earl of Shannon, and by him preſented to the duke of Bedford, could not fail to be very agreeable to the government at ſuch a critical conjuncture.

Although no ſigns of diſaffection to his majeſty's family appeared on this trying occaſion, it muſt nevertheleſs be acknowledged, that a ſpirit of diſſatisfaction broke out with extraordinary violence among the populace of Dublin. Whether they were diſſatisfied with the conduct of the lord lieutenant, whoſe character was by no means popular, or began to entertain ſuſpicions of the deſigns of the Engliſh miniſtry; certain it is, great pains were taken to infuſe into them a belief, that an union would ſoon be effected between Great Britain and Ireland; in which caſe this laſt kingdom would be deprived of its parliament and independency, and be ſubjected to the ſame taxes that were impoſed upon the people of England.

This

This notion enraged the populace to ſuch a degree, that they aſſembled in a tumultuous manner, broke into the houſe of lords, inſulted the peers, ſeated an old woman on the throne, and ſearched for the Journals, which, had they found them, they would in all probability have committed to the flames. Not content with this outrage, they compelled the members of both houſes, whom they met in the ſtreets, to take an oath that they would never conſent to ſuch an union, or give any vote contrary to the true intereſt of Ireland. Several coaches belonging to obnoxious perſons were deſtroyed, and their horſes killed; and a gibbet was erected for one gentleman in particular, who narrowly eſcaped the ungovernable rage of thoſe furious inſurgents. A body of horſe and infantry were drawn out on this occaſion, in order to diſperſe the multitude, who accordingly retired to their own habitations. Next day addreſſes were preſented to the lord-lieutenant by both houſes of parliament, and a committee of enquiry appointed, that the ringleaders of the tumult might be ſpeedily apprehended and brought to condign puniſhment.

When the miniſtry of England received the firſt intelligence of Thurot's having ſailed from Dunkirk with a ſmall ſquadron of armed ſhips, and a body of land troops, deſigned for a private expedition on the coaſt of Scotland or Ireland, expreſſes were immediately ſent to the commanding officers of the forces in North Britain, with orders to put the forts along the coaſt of that kingdom in the beſt poſture of defence, and to hold every thing in readineſs to repel the enemy, ſhould they attempt to effect a landing. In conſequence of theſe inſtructions, beacons were erected for the more eaſy communicating the alarm; places of rendezvous appointed for the regular troops and militia; and ſtrict orders iſſued that no officer ſhould abſent himſelf from his duty, on any pretence whatſoever. The greateſt encomium that can be given to the reputation of this adventurer, is an account of the terror which the ſailing of his puny armament diffuſed through the whole extent of ſuch a powerful kingdom, whoſe fleets covered the ocean. Perhaps Thurot's career would have been ſooner checked, had commodore Boys been victualled for a longer cruize; but this commander was obliged to put in at Leith for a ſupply of proviſions, at the very time when Thurot was ſeen hovering upon the coaſt near Aberdeen; and before the Engliſh ſquadron was ready to reſume its cruize, the other had taken ſhelter at Gottenburg in Sweden.

Having thus given a ſuccinct detail of the actions performed in the European ſeas by the naval force of Great Britain, within the compaſs of the preſent year, I ſhall now proceed to relate the exploits of the Britiſh arms within the tropics, and particularly the expedition to Martinico and Guadalupe, which is ſaid to have ſucceeded even beyond the expectation of the miniſtry. A plan had been laid for improving the ſucceſs of the preceding year in North America, by carrying the Britiſh arms up the river St. Laurence, and attacking Quebec, the capital of Canada. The armament allotted for the reduction of Martinico and Guadalupe conſtituted part of this deſign, inaſmuch as the troops employed in that expedition were, in caſe of a failure in the firſt attempt, intended to reinforce the Britiſh army in North America, which was juſtly regarded as the chief ſeat of the war.

What hope of ſucceſs the miniſtry entertained from an attack upon Martinico may be eaſily conjectured from the ſtate of that iſland, as it appeared in a memorial preſented by the French king's lieutenants of its ſeveral diſtricts to the general of the French iſlands, in conſequence of an order iſſued in November, for holding them in readineſs to march and defend the iſland from the Engliſh, of whoſe deſigns they were fully appriſed. They repreſented, that the trade with the Dutch was become their ſole dependance: that they could expect no ſuccour from Europe, by which they had been abandoned ever ſince the commencement of the war: that the traders, veſted with the privilege of trafficking among them, had abuſed the intention of the general, and, inſtead of being of ſervice to the colony, had fixed an arbitrary price for all the proviſions they had brought in, as well as for the commodities which they exported; ſo that the former was valued at as high a price as their avarice could exact, and the latter ſunk as low in value as their own ſelfiſh hearts could deſire: that the colony for two months had been deſtitute of all kinds of proviſion; the commodities of the planters lay upon their hands, and their negroes were in danger of periſhing through hunger; a circumſtance which excited the apprehenſion of the moſt dreadful conſequences: that to ſlaves half-ſtarved, all kinds of bondage were equal; and people reduced to ſuch a ſituation were often driven to deſpair, ſeeking, in anarchy and confuſion, a remedy from the evils by which they were oppreſſed: that the beſt provided of the inhabitants laboured under the want of the common neceſſaries of life; and others had not ſo much as a grain of ſalt in their houſes: that there was an irreparable ſcarcity of ſlaves to cultivate their lands; and the planters were reduced to the neceſſity of killing their cattle to ſupport the lives of thoſe who remained alive; ſo that the mills were no longer worked, and the inhabitants conſumed beforehand what ought to be reſerved for their ſuſtenance, in caſe of being blocked up by the enemy.

They deſired therefore that the general would ſuppreſs the permiſſions granted to particular merchants, and admit neutral veſſels freely into their ports, that they might trade with the inhabitants unmoleſted and unreſtrained. They obſerved, that the citadel of Port Royal ſeemed the principal object on which the ſafety and defence of the country depended; as the loſs of it would be neceſſarily attended with the reduction of the whole iſland: they therefore adviſed that this fort ſhould be ſpeedily furniſhed with every thing neceſſary for its ſafety and defence; and that magazines of proviſion, as well as ammunition, ſhould be eſtabliſhed in different quarters of the iſland.

From this remonſtrance it plainly appears, that the iſland was wholly unprepared to repel the meditated invaſion, and that the plan adopted by the miniſtry of Great Britain was founded on the beſt and moſt authentic intelligence. The regular troops of Martinico amounted to about twenty independent companies, greatly defective in point of number. The militia was compoſed of burghers and planters, diſtreſſed and diſſatisfied, intermixed with a parcel of wretched negroe ſlaves, groaning under the moſt intolerable miſery, from whence they could have no hope of deliverance but by a ſpeedy change of maſters; their magazines were empty, and their fortifications out of repair.

Such was the ſtate of Martinico, when the inhabitants every day expected a viſit from the Britiſh armament, whoſe progreſs I ſhall now deſcribe. On the twelfth day of November, in the preceding year, captain Hughes ſailed from St. Helen's with eight ſail of the line, one frigate, four bomb-ketches, and a fleet of tranſports, having on board ſix regiments of infantry, and a detachment of artillery, beſides eight hundred marines diſtributed among the ſhips of war; this whole force being under the command of major-general Hopſon, an old experienced officer, aſſiſted by major-general Barrington, the colonels Armiger and Haldane, and the lieutenant-colonels Trapaud and Clavering, acting in the capacity of brigadiers. After a voyage of ſeven weeks and three days, the fleet arrived at Barbadoes, and anchored in Carliſle-bay, where they joined commodore Moore, who, in conſequence of his majeſty's expreſs inſtructions for that purpoſe, aſſumed the command of the united ſquadrons, conſiſting of ten ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and bomb-ketches.

Ten days were conſumed in ſupplying the fleet with wood and water, in reviews, reimbarkations, councils of war, aſſemblies of the council belonging to the iſland, in iſſuing proclamations, and beating up for volunteers. At length, every great ſhip being reinforced with forty negroes, to be employed in drawing the artillery; and the troops, which amounted to five thouſand eight hundred and twenty-four men, being joined by four hundred Highlanders belonging to the ſecond battalion of the regiment commanded by lord John Murray in North America, the whole armament ſailed from Carliſle-bay on the thirteenth day of January: but by this time the troops, unaccuſtomed to a hot climate, were conſiderably weakened and reduced by fevers, diarrhœas, the ſcurvy, and the ſmall-pox; which laſt diſeaſe had unhappily broke out amongſt the tranſports. Next morning the ſquadron came in ſight of the iſland of Martinico, which was the place of its deſtination, lying in the latitude of fifteen degrees north, extending about thirteen leagues in length and ſeven in breadth, divided quite acroſs by a lofty ridge of mountains, well watered with ſtreams and rivulets, extremely fertile in its ſoil, which produces ſugar, cotton, ginger, and indigo; indented with commodious bays, of which the moſt conſiderable is the great bay of Port Royal, the capital of the iſland, ſeven miles long, and in ſome places five miles over.

Martinico is ſtill further conſiderable by its centrical ſituation in the midſt of the Caribbees, by its ſtrength, the number of its inhabitants, and the advantages it derives from being the ſeat of government, and ſtaple of trade, from whence even the ſugars of Guadalupe and other French iſlands are exported for the European markets. The chief fortification of the iſland was the citadel of Port Royal, a regular fort, garriſoned by four companies which hardly amounted to the number of one hundred and fifty men, thirty-ſix bombardiers, eighty Swiſs, and fourteen officers. Their whole ſtore of proviſion conſiſted of only one hundred barrels of beef, and they were entirely deſtitute of all other neceſſaries. They were almoſt wholly unprovided with water in the ciſterns, with ſpare carriages for their cannon, match, wadding, and langrage; they had but a ſmall ſtock of other ammunition, and the walls were in many parts decayed. The only preparations they had made for defence were ſome paultry intrenchments formed at St. Pierre, and a place called Caſenavire, where they imagined the deſcent would probably be attempted.

On the fifteenth day of the month the Britiſh ſquadron entered the great bay of Port Royal, ſome of the ſhips being expoſed to the ſhot of a battery erected on the Iſle de Ranieres; a little iſland about half way up the bay. At their approach, the Floriſſant, of ſeventy-four guns, which had been ſo roughly handled by captain Tyrrel in the Buckingham, then lying under the guns of Fort Negro, along with two frigates, turned up under the citadel, and came to anchor in the Carenage, behind the fortification. One of the frigates, during the enſuing night, made her eſcape through the tranſports, and directed her courſe for Europe.

Next day three ſhips of the line were ordered to attack Fort Negro, a battery at the diſtance of three miles from the citadel, which, being mounted with ſeven guns only, was ſoon ſilenced, and immediately poſſeſſed by a detachment of marines and ſailors; who, being landed, in flat-bottomed boats, clambered up the rock, and entered through the embraſures with their bayonets fixed: here, however, they met with no reſiſtance. The enemy had abandoned the fort with precipitation. The Britiſh colours were immediately hoiſted, and centinels of marines poſted upon the parapet. The next care was to ſpike and diſable the cannon, break the carriages, and deſtroy the powder which they found in the magazine: nevertheleſs the detachment was ordered to keep poſſeſſion of the battery. This ſervice being ſucceſsfully performed, three ſhips were ſent to reduce the other battery at Caſenavire, which conſiſted only of four guns, and theſe were ſoon rendered unſerviceable.

The French troops, reinforced by militia, which had been detached from the citadel to oppoſe the landing, obſerving the whole Britiſh ſquadron, and all the tranſports, already within the bay, and Fort-Negro poſſeſſed by the marines, withdrew to Port Royal, leaving the beach open; ſo that the Engliſh troops were diſembarked without oppoſition, and, being formed, advanced into the country towards Fort Negro, in the neighbourhood of which they lay all night upon their arms; while the fleet, which had been galled by bomb-ſhells from the citadel, ſhifted their ſtation, and ſtood farther up the bay.

By ten next day the Engliſh officers had brought up ſome field-pieces to an eminence, and ſcoured the woods, from whence the troops had been greatly annoyed by the ſmall ſhot of the enemy during the beſt part of the night, and all that morning. At noon the Britiſh forces advanced, in order, towards the hill that overlooked the town and citadel of Port Royal, and ſuſtained a troubleſome fire from enemies they could not ſee; for the French militia were entirely concealed among the trees and buſhes. This eminence, called the Morne Tortueſon, though the moſt important poſt of the whole iſland, was neglected by the general of Martinico, who had alſo determined to blow up the fortifications of the place: but, luckily for the iſlanders, he had not prepared the materials for this operation, which muſt have been followed by the immediate reduction of the capital, and indeed of the whole country. Some of the inferior officers, ſenſible of the importance of the Morne Tortueſon, reſolved to defend that poſt with a body of the militia, which had been joined by the garriſons of Fort Negro and Caſenavire, as well as by ſome ſoldiers detached from the Floriſſant: but notwithſtanding all their endeavours, as they were entirely deſtitute of cannon, extremely deficient in point of diſcipline, diſheartened by the puſillanimity of their governor, and in a great meaſure diſconcerted by the general conſternation that prevailed among the inhabitants, in all probability they could not have withſtood a ſpirited and well conducted attack.

The Engliſh army, however, met with much greater obſtruction from the nature of the ground than from the ſtrength of the enemy. The whole country was interſected with a number of gullies, incloſed by ſteep and almoſt perpendicular precipices; ſo that it was extremely difficult for the troops to advance, and abſolutely impoſſible for them to tranſport their artillery. The general, therefore, ſent word to the commodore, that he could not maintain his ground, unleſs the ſquadron would ſupply him with heavy cannon, landed near the town of Port Royal, or aſſiſt him in attacking the citadel by ſea, while he ſhould make his approaches by land. Both theſe expedients being deemed impracticable, the attempt upon Port Royal was forthwith abandoned, and the troops being recalled from their advanced poſts, were reimbarked in the evening without moleſtation.

The majority of the Britiſh officers, who compoſed the council of war, having given it as their opinion, that it might be for his majeſty's ſervice to make an attack upon St. Pierre, the fleet proceeded to that part of the iſland, and entered the bay on the nineteenth. The commodore told the general, that he made no doubt of being able to reduce the town of St. Pierre: but, as the ſhips might be diſabled in the attack, ſo as not to be in a condition to proceed immediately on any other material ſervice; as the troops might alſo be reduced in their numbers, ſo as to be incapable of future attacks; as, even upon the ſuppoſition of its being taken, the general ſeemed apprehenſive of his not being able to garriſon the place; and as the reduction of the iſland of Guadalupe would be of great benefit to the ſugar colonies; Mr. Moore propoſed that the armament ſhould immediately proceed to this iſland; and the general agreed to the propoſal. Before this reſolution was taken, however, the commodore had ordered the bay of St. Pierre to be ſounded, and directed the Rippon to advance, and ſilence a battery ſituated a mile and a half to the northward of the town. Accordingly captain Jekyl, who commanded that ſhip, ſtood in, and anchoring cloſe to the ſhore, attacked it with ſuch impetuoſity, that in a few minutes it was abandoned. At the ſame time the Rippon was expoſed to the fire of two other ſmall batteries, from which ſhe received conſiderable damage both in her hull and rigging; and was in great danger of running aground, when orders were given to tow her out of danger.

The whole armament having abandoned the deſign on Martinico, directed their courſe to Guadalupe, another of the Caribbee iſlands, lying at the diſtance of thirty leagues to the weſtward, about fifteen leagues in length, and twelve in breadth; divided into two parts by a channel, which the inhabitants croſs in a ferry-boat. The weſtern diviſion is diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of Baſſe-terre, or Guadalupe properly ſo called; and here the metropolis ſtands, defended by the citadel and other fortifications. The eaſtern part, called Grand-terre, is deſtitute of freſh water, which abounds in the other diviſion, and is ſecured by fort Louis, with a redoubt, which commands the road in the diſtrict of Goſier. The gut, or canal that ſeparates the two parts, is known by the name of the Salt River, having a road or bay at each end; the one called the great Cul de Sac, the other the ſmall Cul de Sac. Guadalupe is covered with high mountains and precipices, to which the inhabitants uſed to convey their valuable effects in time of danger: but here are alſo beautiful plains, watered by brooks and rivers, which fertilize the ſoil, enabling it to produce a great quantity of ſugar, cotton, indigo, tobacco, and caſſia; beſides plenty of rice, potatoes, all kinds of pulſe and fruit peculiar to the iſland. The country is populous and flouriſhing, and the government comprehends two ſmaller iſlands, called All Saints, and Deſeada, which appear at a ſmall diſtance from the coaſt, on the eaſtern ſide of the iſland.

The Britiſh ſquadron arrived at Baſſe-terre on the twenty-ſecond day of January; and the chief engineer having reconnoitred the town, pronounced it abſolutely impregnable to ſhipping. The commodore, however, was of another opinion. Having diſpoſed his ſhips in proper order, he reſolved to attack it early next morning. At nine, the Lion, commanded by captain Trelawney, began the engagement againſt a battery of nine guns; and the reſt of the fleet continued to draw up a-breaſt of the other batteries and the citadel, which mounted forty-ſix cannon, beſides two mortars. The action in a little time became general, and was maintained on both ſides for ſeveral hours with great vivacity: while the commodore, who had ſhifted his flag into the Woolwich frigate, kept aloof without gunſhot, that he might be the more diſengaged to view the ſtate of the battle, and give his orders with the greater preciſion.

During the whole attack, all the ſea commanders behaved with extraordinary ſpirit and reſolution, particularly the captains Leſſie, Burnet, Gayton, Jekyl, Trelawney, and Shuldam; who, in the very hotteſt of the action, diſtinguiſhed themſelves equally by their courage and deliberation. About five in the afternoon, the fire of the citadel was exhauſted. The Burford and Berwick were driven out to ſea; ſo that captain Shuldam in the Panther was unſupported; and two batteries played upon the Rippon, captain Jekyl, who, by two in the afternoon, ſilenced the guns of one called the Morne-rouge; but at the ſame time could not prevent his ſhip from running a-ground. The enemy obſerving her diſaſter, aſſembled in great numbers on the

the hill, and lined the trenches, from whence they poured in a ſevere fire of muſquetry. The militia afterwards brought up a cannon of eighteen pound ball; and for two hours raked her fore and aft with conſiderable effect: nevertheleſs captain Jekyl returned the fire with equal ſpirit and perſeverance; and being aſſiſted by captain Leſlie, of the Briſtol, found means at laſt to get out of all danger. At ſeven in the evening, all the other large ſhips having ſilenced the guns to which they had been reſpectively oppoſed, he joined the reſt of the fleet. The four bomb-ketches being anchored near the ſhore, began to ply the town with ſhells and carcaſſes; ſo that in a little time the houſes were in flames; the magazines of gun-powder blew up with the moſt terrible exploſion; and about ten o'clock the whole place was involved in one general conflagration.

Next day, at two in the afternoon, the fleet arrived in the road of Baſſeterre, where they found the hulls of divers ſhips which the enemy had ſet on fire at their approach: ſeveral ſhips turned out and endeavoured to eſcape, but were intercepted and taken by the Engliſh ſquadron. At five the troops landed without oppoſition, and took poſſeſſion of the town and citadel, which they found entirely abandoned. They learned from a Genoeſe deſerter, that the regular troops of the iſland conſiſted of five companies only, the whole amounting to a very inconſiderable number; and that they had laid a train to blow up the powder magazine in the citadel; but had been obliged to retreat with ſuch precipitation, as did not permit them to execute this deſign. The train was immediately cut off, and the magazine ſecured. The nails with which they had ſpiked up their cannon were drilled out by the matroſſes; and in the mean time the Britiſh colours were hoiſted on the parapet. Part of the troops took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt on an eminence, and part entered the town, which ſtill continued burning with great violence.

In the morning, at day-break, the enemy appeared, to the number of two thouſand, about four miles from the town, and began to throw up intrenchments in the neighbourhood of a houſe where the governor had fixed his head quarters, declaring he would maintain his ground to the laſt extremity. To this reſolution indeed he was encouraged by the nature of the ground, and the neighbourhood of a paſs called the Dos d'Ane, a cleft through a mountainous ridge, opening a communication with Capeſterre, a more level and beautiful part of the iſland. The aſcent from Baſſeterre to this paſs was ſo very ſteep, and the way ſo broken and interrupted by rocks and gullies, that there was no proſpect of attacking it with ſucceſs, except at the firſt landing, when the inhabitants were ſeized with the moſt terrible panic. They ſoon, however, recovered their wonted ſpirit, aſſembled and fortified themſelves among the hills, armed and arrayed their negroes, and affected to hold the invaders at defiance. A flag of truce being ſent with offers of terms to their governor, the chevalier d'Etreil, he rejected them in a letter, with which his ſubſequent conduct but very ill correſponded. Indeed from the beginning his deportment had been ſuch as gave no very favourable idea of his character. When the Britiſh ſquadron advanced to the attack, inſtead of viſiting in perſon the citadel and the batteries, in order to encourage and animate his people by his exhortation and example, he retired out of the reach of danger to a diſtant plantation, where he remained a tame ſpectator of the deſtruction that overwhelmed the capital of the iſland. Next morning, when he ought to have exerted himſelf in preventing the diſembarkation of the Engliſh troops, who had a difficult ſhore and violent ſurf to encounter, and when he might have defended the entrenchments and lines which had been made to oppoſe their landing, he abandoned all theſe advantages, and took ſhelter among the mountains that were deemed inacceſſible.

But however puſillanimous the conduct of the governor, certain it is the inhabitants behaved with great ſpirit and activity in defence of their country. They continually harraſſed the ſcouring detachments, by firing upon them from woods and ſugar plantations. Their armed negroes in particular were very expert in this kind of buſh-fighting. The natives or militia appeared in conſiderable parties, and even attacked detached bodies of the Britiſh army. A lady of maſculine courage, whoſe name was Ducharmy, having armed her ſlaves, headed them in perſon, made ſeveral bold attempts upon an advanced poſt poſſeſſed by major Melville, and threw up intrenchments upon a hill oppoſite to the ſtation of this officer, who had all along diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his intrepidity, vigilance, and conduct. At length the works of this virago were ſtormed by a regular detachment, which, after an obſtinate and dangerous conflict, entered the intrenchment ſword in hand, and burned the houſes and plantations; but the lady, who commanded in perſon during the action, eſcaped with ſome difficulty. Some of the enemy were killed, and a good number taken; of the Engliſh detachment twelve ſoldiers were ſlain, and thirty wounded, including three ſubaltern officers, one of whom loſt his arm.

The greateſt body of the enemy was poſted at the governor's head quarters, where they had raiſed a redoubt, and formed ſome intrenchments. From theſe a conſiderable detachment advanced on the ſixth day of February, in the morning, towards the citadel, and fell in with an Engliſh party, whom they attacked with great vivacity; but after a ſhort, though warm diſpute, they were obliged to retire with the loſs of ſome men. Without all queſtion the inhabitants of Guadalupe purſued the moſt feaſible plan that could poſſibly have been concerted for their own ſafety. Inſtead of riſking a general engagement with regular troops, in which in all probability they would have been defeated, they reſolved to weary them out, by maintaining a kind of petty war in ſeparate parties, to alarm and harraſs the Engliſh with hard duty in a ſultry climate, where they were but indifferently ſupplied with proviſion and refreſhment. Both the army and navy were attacked with fevers and other diſeaſes epidemical in thoſe hot countries; and the regimental hoſpitals were ſo crouded, that it was found abſolutely neceſſary to ſend five hundred ſick men to the iſland of Antigua, where they might be properly attended.

In the mean time, the reduction of the iſlanders on the ſide of Guadalupe becoming every day more difficult, the general reſolved to transfer the ſeat of war to the eaſtern and more fertile part of the iſland, called Grand-terre, which, as I have already obſerved, was ſecured by a ſtrong battery, named Fort Louis. In purſuance of this plan, the great ſhips were ſent round to Grand-terre, in order to reduce this fortification, which they accordingly attacked on the thirteenth day of February. After a ſevere cannonading, which laſted ſix hours, a body of marines being landed, with the Highlanders, they drove the enemy from their intrenchments ſword in hand, and, taking poſſeſſion of the fort, hoiſted the Engliſh colours.

In a few days after this exploit, general Hopſon dying at Baſſeterre, the chief command devolved upon general Barrington, who determined to proſecute the entire reduction of the iſland with the utmoſt vigour and diſpatch. The better to facilitate this conqueſt, the commodore ordered two ſhips of war to cruize off the iſland of St. Euſtatia, and prevent the Dutch traders from aſſiſting the natives of Guadalupe, whom they had hitherto conſtantly ſupplied with proviſions ſince they withdrew to the mountains. General Barrington, on the very firſt day of his command, ordered the troops who were encamped to ſtrike their tents and build huts, that the enemy might imagine he intended to continue in this quarter; but in a few days the batteries in and about Baſſeterre were blown up and deſtroyed, the detachments recalled from the advanced poſts, and the whole army reimbarked, except one regiment, with a detachment of artillery, left in garriſon at the citadel; the command of which was conferred on colonel Debriſay, an accompliſhed officer of great experience.

The enemy no ſooner obſerved the coaſt clear than they ruſhed down from the hills, and endeavoured to make themſelves maſters of the town, from which however they were driven by the fire of the citadel. They afterwards erected a battery, from whence they annoyed this fortification both by ſhot and ſhells, and even threatened a regular attack; but as often as they approached the place, they were repulſed by ſallies from the caſtle. In the midſt of theſe hoſtilities, the gallant Debriſay, together with major Trollop, one lieutenant, two bombardiers, and ſeveral common ſoldiers, were blown up, and periſhed by the exploſion of a powder magazine at the flanked angle of the ſouth-eaſt baſtion. The confuſion neceſſarily produced by ſuch an unfortunate accident, encouraged the enemy to come pouring down from the hills, in order to take advantage of the diſaſter; but they were ſoon repulſed by the fire of the garriſon. The general, being made acquainted with the fate of colonel Debriſay, beſtowed the government of the fort upon major Melvil, and ſent thither the chief engineer to repair and improve the fortifications.

In the mean time, commodore Moore having received certain intelligence that monſieur de Bompart had arrived at Martinico with a ſquadron, conſiſting of eight ſail of the line and three frigates, having on board a whole battalion of Swiſs, and ſome other troops, to reinforce the garriſons of the iſlands, he called in his cruizers, and ſailed immediately to the bay of Dominique, an iſland to the windward, at the diſtance of nine leagues from Guadalupe, whence he could always be able to oppoſe any attempts which the French commander might make againſt the operations of the Britiſh armaments. Some reflections were thrown on his conduct for retiring ſo ſpeedily to this ſtation, and not rather advancing directly to attack the French ſquadron; but theſe cenſures appeared, in the ſequel, to have proceeded either from prejudice or ignorance.

General Barrington being by this time left with one ſhip of forty guns, for the protection of the tranſports, concerted a plan of proſecuting the war in Guadalupe by detachments; and the ſucceſs fully anſwered his expectation. He determined to make a deſcent on the diviſion of the iſland called Grand-terre, and for that purpoſe allotted ſix hundred men, who, under the command of colonel Crump, landed between the towns of St. Anne and St. François, and demoliſhed ſome batteries of the enemy, from whence he met with very little oppoſition. While he was employed in this ſervice, a detachment of three hundred men attacked the town of Goſier, which, notwithſtanding a ſevere fire, they took by aſſault, drove the garriſon into the woods, ſet fire to the place, and deſtroyed the battery and intrenchment raiſed for its defence. This exploit being happily atchieved, the detachment was ordered to force their way to Fort Louis, while the garriſon of that caſtle was directed to make two ſallies, in order to favour their irruption. They accordingly penetrated with ſome loſs, ſuſtained in forcing a ſtrong paſs, and took poſſeſſion of a battery which the enemy had raiſed againſt the Engliſh camp, in the neighbourhood of Fort Louis.

The general, having hitherto ſucceeded in his deſigns, formed the ſcheme of ſurpriſing at once the three towns of Petitbourg, Guoyave, and St. Mary, ſituated on the Baſſe-terre ſide of the little Cul de Sac, and entruſted the execution of it to the colonels Crump and Clavering: but the night appointed for the ſervice, proved extremely dark and tempeſtuous, and the negro conductors were ſo frightened, that they ran ſeveral of the flat-bottomed boats on the ſhoals that ſkirt this part of the iſland. Colonel Clavering landed with about eighty men; but found himſelf ſo entangled with mangrove-trees, and the mud ſo impaſſably deep, that he was obliged to reimbark, though not before the enemy had diſcovered his deſign. This project having failed, the general detached the ſame commanders, whoſe gallantry and conduct cannot be ſufficiently extolled, with a detachment of fifteen hundred men, including one hundred and fifty volunteers from Antigua, to land in a bay not far from the town of Arnonville, at the bottom of the little Cul de Sac, under the protection of his majeſty's ſhip the Woolwich. The enemy made no oppoſition to their landing; but retreated, as the Engliſh advanced, to a ſtrong intrenchment thrown up behind the river Lecorne, a poſt of the utmoſt importance, as it commanded the whole country as far as the bay Mahaut, where proviſions and ſupplies of all ſorts were landed from St. Euſtatia. The river was rendered inacceſſible by a moraſs, covered with mangroves, except at two narrow paſſes, which they had ſecured with a redoubt, and intrenchments well palliſaded, mounted with cannon, and defended by a numerous militia: beſides, the narrow roads, through which only they could be attacked, were interſected with deep and wide ditches.

Notwithſtanding

Notwithſtanding theſe obſtructions, the Engliſh commanders reſolved to hazard an aſſault. While four field-pieces and two howitzers maintained a conſtant fire upon the top of the intrenchments, the regiment of Duroure and the Highlanders advanced under this cover, firing by platoons with the utmoſt regularity. The enemy, intimidated by their cool and reſolute behaviour, began to abandon the firſt intrenchment on the left. Then the Highlanders, drawing their ſwords, and ſuſtained by part of the regiment, threw themſelves in with their uſual impetuoſity, and followed the fugitives pell-mell into the redoubt, of which they took poſſeſſion: but the enemy ſtill kept their ground within the intrenchments on the right, from whence they annoyed the aſſailants both with muſquetry and cannon. In half an hour, an occaſional bridge being made, the Engliſh troops croſſed the river in order to attack this poſt, which the enemy abandoned with precipitation: notwithſtanding all their haſte, however, about ſeventy were taken priſoners, and among theſe ſome of the moſt conſiderable inhabitants of the iſland. This advantage coſt the Engliſh two officers and thirteen men killed, and about fifty wounded.

The roads being mended for the paſſage of the artillery, the troops proceeded towards Petit-bourg, harraſſed in their march by flying bodies of the enemy, and arrived late at night on the banks of the river Lizarde, the only ford of which the French had ſecured with ſtrong intrenchments, defended by a battery of four cannon, erected on a riſing ground in the rear. Colonel Clavering, while he amuſed them all night at this place by a conſtant fire into their lines, tranſported in two canoes, which he launched about a mile and a half farther down the river, a ſufficient number of troops, by day-break, to attack them on the other ſide in flank, while he ſhould charge them in front at the head of his little army; but they did not think proper to ſuſtain the aſſault. On the contrary, they no ſooner diſcovered his intention than they deſerted the poſt, and fled with precipitation. Colonel Clavering having croſſed the river, purſued them to Petit-bourg, which they had alſo fortified; and here he found captain Uvedale, of the Grenada bomb-ketch, throwing ſhells into the redoubt. He inſtantly ſent detachments to occupy the neighbouring heights; a circumſtance which the enemy no ſooner perceived than they abandoned the place, and retired in diſorder.

On the fifteenth day of April captain Steele deſtroyed a battery at Guoyave, a ſtrong poſt, which, though it might have been defended againſt an army, the French relinquiſhed abruptly, after having made a haſty diſcharge of their artillery. At the ſame time colonel Crump was detached with ſeven hundred men to the bay of Mahaut, where he burned the town and batteries, which he found abandoned, together with a vaſt quantity of proviſions which had been brought from the iſland of St. Euſtatia. Colonel Clavering, having left a ſmall garriſon at Petit-bourg, began his march on the twentieth day of the month towards St. Mary's, where he underſtood the enemy had aſſembled their whole force, thrown up intrenchments, and raiſed barricadoes; but they had left their rear unguarded. The Engliſh commander immediately detached colonel Barlow with a body of troops to attack them from that quarter, while he himſelf advanced againſt the front of their intrenchment They ſtood but one cannon-ſhot, and fled to their lines and batteries at St. Mary's, the flanks of which were ſecured with woods and precipices. When they obſerved the Engliſh troops endeavouring to ſurmount theſe difficulties, and turn their lines, they quitted them, in order to oppoſe the deſign; and were immediately attacked with ſuch vivacity, in the face of a ſevere fire of muſquetry and cannon, that they abandoned their ground, and fled in the utmoſt confuſion, leaving the field and all their artillery to the victors, who took up their quarters for the night at St. Mary's.

Next day they entered the fertile country of Capeſterre, where eight hundred and ſeventy negroes, belonging to one planter, ſurrendered at diſcretion. Here colonel Clavering was met by meſſieurs de Clainvilliers and Duqueruy, deputed by the principal inhabitants of the iſland, to know what capitulation would be granted. Theſe he conducted to Petit-bourg, where they were preſented to general Barrington, who, conſidering the abſence of the fleet, the ſmall number of his forces daily diminiſhing, the nature of the country, and the poſſibility of the enemy's being reinforced from Martinico, wiſely took advantage of their preſent panic, and ſettled the terms of capitulation without delay. The ſanity of this reſolution was ſoon viſible. The inhabitants had juſt ſigned the agreement, when a meſſenger arrived in their camp with intelligence that M. de Beauharnois, the general of the French iſlands, had landed at St. Anne, to the windward, with a reinforcement from Martinico, conſiſting of ſix hundred regulars from Europe, and about fifteen hundred militia, with a great ſupply of arms and ammunition, mortars, and artillery, under convoy of the ſquadron commanded by M. de Bompart, who no ſooner heard that the capitulation was ſigned than he reimbarked the troops and ſtores with all poſſible expedition, and ſailed back to Martinico.

Thus we ſee that the conqueſt of this important iſland, which is ſaid to produce a greater quantity of ſugar than any other of the Weſt Indian plantations, was as much owing to accident as to the valour of the troops and the conduct of the general: for, had the reinforcement arrived an hour ſooner than it actually landed, in all probability the Engliſh would have found it extremely difficult to complete the reduction of Guadalupe. Whatever be in this, certain it is that the inhabitants manifeſted great gallantry in the defence of their country, and no leſs fortitude in bearing their ſubjection now that it was inevitable. They immediately quitted the Dos d'Ane, and all their other poſts, and returned to their reſpective habitations.

The town of Baſſeterre being entirely reduced to aſhes, the inhabitants began to clear away the rubbiſh, and erected occaſional ſheds, where they reſumed their ſeveral occupations with that good humour ſo peculiar to the French nation; and general Barrington humanely indulged them with all the aſſiſtance in his power.

Soon after the reduction of Guadalupe, the iſlands of Deſeada, Los Santos, and Marigalante, were ſummoned to ſurrender; and they accordingly ſubmitted upon the ſame terms which was granted to the great iſland: but this ſtep was not taken till after the departure of general Barrington for England.

This officer having happily completed the reduction of Guadalupe, ſent word to the commodore that he intended to ſend back part of the troops with the tranſports to Great Britain about the beginning of July. In conſequence of this intimation, Mr. Moore ſailed with his ſquadron to Baſſeterre road, where he was next day joined by two ſhips of the line from England, which rendered him ſuperior in ſtrength to the commander of the French ſquadron, who at this time retired to the iſland of Grenada, lying about eight leagues from Guadalupe. Here he was diſcovered by the ſhip Rippon, whoſe captain returned immediately to Baſſeterre, in order to inform the commodore of this circumſtance: but before he could put to ſea, a frigate arrived with advice that Bompart had departed from Grenada, and was ſuppoſed to have directed his courſe to Hiſpaniola. The commodore immediately diſpatched the Ludlow-caſtle with this intelligence to admiral Cotes, who commanded the ſquadron at Jamaica.

General Barrington having made a tour of Guadalupe, in order to viſit and repair the fortifications which he thought neceſſary to be maintained, and the affairs relating to the inhabitants being entirely ſettled, he ſent the Highlanders, with a body of draughts, to North America, under convoy; he garriſoned the principal towns of the iſland, and left the chief command to colonel Crump, who had for ſome time acted as brigadier-general, colonel Clavering having been ſent home to England with the news of the conqueſt. Colonel Melville, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a remarkable manner ever ſince their firſt landing, continued governor of the citadel at Baſſeterre; and the command at Grand-terre was beſtowed on colonel Delgarno. Three complete regiments were aſſigned as a ſufficient guard for the whole iſland, and the other three were embarked for England. General Barrington himſelf went on board the Roebuck in the latter end of June, and with the tranſports, under convoy of a ſmall ſquadron, ſet ſail for Great Britain, while commodore Moore with his larger fleet directed his courſe to Antigua.

During theſe tranſactions in the Leeward Iſlands, the war was carried on with no leſs vigour in North America, which may be properly conſidered as the chief ſcene of action. In October of the preceding year a grand aſſembly had been held at Eaſton, about ninety miles from Philadelphia; and there peace was concluded, by a formal treaty, between Great Britain and the ſeveral nations of Indians inhabiting the country between the Apalachian mountains and the lakes. The Twightwees, however, ſettled between the river Ohio and the lakes, did not aſſiſt at this interview, though ſome ſteps had been taken to ſecure the alliance of that people. The conferences were managed by the governors of Penſylvania and New Jerſey, accompanied by ſir William Johnſon's deputy for Indian affairs, four members of the council of Penſylvania, ſix members of the aſſembly, two agents for the province of New Jerſey, a great number of planters and citizens of Philadelphia, chiefly quakers. They were met by the deputies and chiefs of the Mohawks, Oneidoes, Onondagoes, Cayagas, Senecas, Tuſcaroras, Nanticoques, and Conoys; the Tuteloes, Chugnuts, Delawares, and Unamies; the Miniſinks, Mohicons, and Wappingers; the whole number, including their women and children, amounting to five hundred and ſeven.

Some of the Six Nations thinking themſelves aggrieved by the Britiſh coloniſts, who had impriſoned ſome of their countrymen, killed a few, and treated others with neglect, did not fail to expreſs their reſentment, which had been artfully fomented by the French emiſſaries, even into an open rupture. The Delawares and Miniſinks in particular complained that the Engliſh had encroached upon their lands, and on that account were provoked to hoſtilities: but Teedyuſcung, the chief of the former, had made overtures of peace; and, in the character of ambaſſador from all the ten nations, had been very inſtrumental in forming this aſſembly. The chiefs of the Six Nations, though very well diſpoſed to peace, took umbrage at the importance aſſumed by this chief of the Delawares, over whom, as their deſcendants, they claimed a kind of parental authority; and on this occaſion they made no ſcruple to expreſs their diſpleaſure. The buſineſs therefore of the Engliſh governors, at this congreſs, was to aſcertain the limits of the lands in diſpute, reconcile the Six Nations with their nephews the Delawares, remove every cauſe of miſunderſtanding between the Engliſh and the Indians, detach theſe ſavages entirely from the French intereſt, eſtabliſh a firm peace, and induce them to exert their influence in perſuading the Twightwees to accede to this treaty.

Thoſe Indians, though poſſeſſed of few ideas, circumſcribed in their mental faculties, ſtupid, brutal, and ferocious, conduct themſelves nevertheleſs, in matters of importance to the community, by the general maxims of reaſon and juſtice; and their treaties are always founded upon good ſenſe, conveyed in a very ridiculous manner. Their language is guttural, harſh, and polyſyllabical; and their ſpeech conſiſts of hyperbolical metaphors and ſimilies, which inveſt it with an air of dignity, and heighten the expreſſion. They manage their conferences by means of wampum, a kind of bead, formed of hard ſhells, either in ſingle ſtrings, or ſewed in broad belts of different dimenſions, according to the importance of the ſubject. Every propoſition is offered, every anſwer made, every promiſe corroborated, every declaration atteſted, and every treaty confirmed, by producing and interchanging theſe belts of wampum.

The conferences were continued from the eighth to the twenty-ſixth day of October, when every article was ſettled to the mutual ſatisfaction of all parties. The Indian deputies were gratified with a valuable preſent, conſiſting of looking-glaſſes, knives, tobacco-boxes, ſleeve-buttons, thimbles, ſheers, gun-locks, ivory combs, ſhirts plain and ruffled, ſhoes and ſtockings for men and women, hats, caps, handkerchiefs, thread, cloaths, blankets, gartering, ſerges, watch-coats, and a few ſuits of laced cloaths for their chieftains. To complete their happineſs, the ſtores of rum were opened: they drank themſelves into a ſtate of brutal intoxication, and next day returned in peace to their reſpective places of habitation.

This treaty with the Indians, who had been debauched from the intereſt of Great Britain, happily contributed to facilitate the operations which had been projected againſt the French ſettlements in Canada. Inſtead of employing the whole ſtrength of the Britiſh arms in North America upon one object, the Britiſh miniſtry reſolved to divide the forces, and make impreſſions on three different parts at once, that the enemy might be divided, diſtracted, and weakened, and the conqueſt of Canada accompliſhed in one campaign. In order the more effectually to inſure ſucceſs, the different expeditions were planned in ſuch a manner as to co-operate with each other occaſionally; ſo practicable was it thought for them to maintain ſuch a correſpondence as would admit of a junction of this nature.

The project of this campaign imported, that general Wolfe, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo eminently in the ſiege of Louiſbourg, ſhould proceed up the river St. Laurence as ſoon as the navigation ſhould be clear of ice, with a body of eight thouſand men, and a conſiderable ſquadron of ſhips from England, to undertake the ſiege of Quebec, the capital of Canada: that general Amherſt, who commanded in chief, ſhould, with another army of regular troops and provincials, amounting to twelve thouſand men, reduce Ticonderoga and Crown-Point, croſs the lake Champlain, and, proceeding along the river Richelieu to the banks of St. Laurence, join general Wolfe in the ſiege of Quebec: that brigadier-general Prideaux, with a third body, reinforced by a conſiderable number of friendly Indians, aſſembled by the influence and under the command of ſir William Johnſon, ſhould attack the French fort erected by the fall of the cataract of Niagara, which was certainly the moſt important poſt of all French America, as it in a manner commands all the interior parts of that vaſt continent. It overawes the whole country of the Six Nations, who were perſuaded to agree to its being built on their territory: it ſecured all the inland trade, the navigation of the great lakes, the communication between Canada and Louiſiana, and opened a way for inroads into the colonies of Great Britain. It was propoſed that the Britiſh forces, having taken Niagara, ſhould be embarked on the lake Ontario, ſail down the river St. Laurence, reduce the town of Montreal, and then join or co-operate with Amherſt's army. Beſides theſe larger armaments, colonel Stanwix was entruſted with a ſmaller detachment for ſubduing ſmaller forts, and ſcouring the banks of the lake Ontario.

The ſame good fortune that ſo remarkably attended the Britiſh arms in the conqueſt of Guadalupe, ſeemed to accompany them in a manner ſtill more aſtoniſhing in the ſiege of Quebec, the particulars of which we ſhall relate in their proper place: at preſent, we muſt explain the operations of general Amherſt, whoſe ſeparate army was firſt in motion, though ſuch impediments were thrown in his way as greatly retarded the progreſs of his armament.

The ſummer was already far advanced before he could paſs lake George with his forces, and reach the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga, where in the preceding year the Britiſh troops had ſuſtained ſuch a terrible diſaſter. At firſt the enemy ſeemed determined to defend this fortreſs; but perceiving the Engliſh commander reſolute, cautious, and well prepared for undertaking the ſiege, having moreover orders to retreat, from place to place, towards the centre of operations at Quebec, rather than run the riſk of being made priſoners of war; they, in the night of July the 27th, abandoned the poſt, after having in ſome meaſure demoliſhed the fortifications, and retired to Crown Point, a fort ſituated on the banks of Lake Champlain. General Amherſt having taken poſſeſſion of this important poſt, which effectually ſecured the frontiers of New York, and afforded to himſelf a ſafe retreat in caſe of neceſſity, ordered the works to be repaired, and allotted a ſtrong garriſon for its defence. This acquiſition, however, was not made without the loſs of a brave accompliſhed young officer, colonel Roger Townſhend, who, in reconnoitring the fort, was killed with a cannon ſhot, and fell near the ſame ſpot which, in the former year, had been enriched with the blood of the gallant lord Howe, whom he ſtrongly reſembled in the circumſtances of birth, age, qualifications, and character.

While the general ſuperintended the repairs of Ticonderoga, and the men were employed in conſtructing batteaus and other veſſels, his ſcouting parties hovered in the neighbourhood of Crown-Point, in order to watch the motions of the enemy. From one of theſe detachments he received information on the firſt day of Auguſt, that the enemy had abruptly left Crown-Point. He forthwith detached a body of rangers before him to take poſſeſſion of the place, embarked with the reſt of his army, and on the fourth day of the month landed at the fort, where the troops were immediately encamped. His next care was to lay the foundations of a new fort, to be maintained for the ſecurity of the Britiſh dominions in that part of the country, and particularly for guarding againſt the inroads of ſcalping parties, by whom the plantations had been dreadfully infeſted.

Here he likewiſe received intelligence that the enemy had retired to the iſle Aux Noix, at the other end of the lake Champlain, five leagues on the hither ſide of St. John's: that their force encamped in that place, under the command of M. de Burlemaque, conſiſted of three battalions and five piquets of regular troops, with Canadians and marines, amounting in the whole to three thouſand five hundred effective men, provided with a numerous artillery; and that the lake was occupied by four large veſſels, mounted with cannon, and manned with piquets of different regiments, under the command of M. le Bras, a captain in the French navy, aſſiſted by M. de Rigal, and other ſea officers. In conſequence of this intimation, the Engliſh general, who had for ſome time employed captain Loring to ſuperintend the building of veſſels at Ticonderoga, being determined to have the ſuperiority on the lake, directed the captain to build, with all poſſible diſpatch, a ſloop of ſixteen guns, and a radeau eighty-four feet in length, capable of carrying ſix large cannon.

Theſe, together with a brigantine, being finiſhed, victualled, and manned, by the eleventh day of October, the general embarked with the whole troops in batteaus, in order to attack the enemy; but next day, the weather growing tempeſtuous, he

he was forced to take ſhelter in a bay on the weſtern ſhore, where the men were landed for refreſhment. In the mean time captain Loring, with his ſmall ſquadron, ſailed down the lake, gave chace to a French ſchooner, and drove three of their ſhips into a bay, where two of them were ſunk, and the third run aground by their own crews, who eſcaped. This laſt, however, was repaired and brought away by captain Loring; ſo that now the French had but one ſchooner left. General Amherſt, after having been ſome days wind-bound, reimbarked his forces, and proceeded down the lake; but the ſtorm which had abated beginning to blow with redoubled fury, ſo as to ſwell the waves mountain high, the ſeaſon for action being elapſed, and winter ſetting in with a moſt ſevere froſt, he ſaw the impoſſibility of executing his deſign, and was obliged to deſiſt.

Returning to the ſame bay where he had formerly taken ſhelter, he landed the troops, and began his march for Crown-Point, where he arrived on the twenty-firſt day of October. Having attained a ſuperiority on the lake, he now employed all his attention in raiſing the new fortreſs at Crown-Point, together with three ſmall out-forts for its better defence; in forming roads of communication with Ticonderoga, and the governments of the Maſſachuſets and New Hampſhire; and in making diſpoſitions for the winter-quarters of his troops, ſo as to ſecure the country from the inroads of the enemy. During this whole ſummer he received not the leaſt intelligence of Mr. Wolfe's operations, except a few hints in ſome intercepted letters of the French general Montcalm, relating to the exchange of priſoners. From theſe he learned that Mr. Wolfe had landed in the neighbourhood of Quebec, and ſeemed determined to undertake the ſiege of that city: that he had honoured him (the French general) with ſeveral notes, ſometimes couched in a ſoothing ſtrain, ſometimes filled with menaces: that the French army intended to give him battle; and a few days would determine the fate of Quebec.

Though Mr. Amherſt was ignorant of the proceedings of the Quebec ſquadron, he enjoyed nevertheleſs a free communication with the forces employed againſt Niagara, and had the ſatisfaction to hear of their ſucceſs before he quitted the lines of Ticonderoga. General Prideaux, with his body of troops, reinforced by the Indian auxiliaries under ſir William Johnſon, advanced to the cataract of Niagara without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition on his march; and inveſting the French fortreſs about the middle of July, carried on his approaches with great vigour till the twentieth day of that month, when, viſiting the trenches, he was unfortunately killed by the burſting of a cohorn. Mr. Amherſt was no ſooner appriſed of his diſaſter than he detached from Ticonderoga brigadier-general Gage, to aſſume the command of that army. In the mean time it devolved to ſir William Johnſon, who, though in a great meaſure unacquainted with the rules of war, proſecuted the plan of his predeceſſor with all the ſkill and activity of the moſt veteran commander.

The enemy, alarmed with the apprehenſion of loſing a place of ſuch importance, reſolved to exert their endeavours for its relief. They collected a body of regular troops, amounting to twelve hundred men, drawn from Detroit, Venango, and Preſque Iſle; and theſe, with a number of Indian auxiliaries, were detached, under the command of monſieur d'Aubry, on an attempt to reinforce the garriſon of Niagara. Sir William Johnſon having received intelligence of their deſign, made a diſpoſition to intercept them in their march. In the evening he ordered the light infantry and piquets to poſt themſelves to the left, on the road leading from Niagara falls to the fortreſs; and theſe were reinforced in the morning with the grenadiers, and part of the forty-ſixth regiment, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Maſſey; and another regiment, under lieutenant-colonel Farquhar, was poſted at the tail of the works, in order to ſupport the guard of the trenches. About eight in the morning, the enemy being in ſight, the Indians in the Engliſh army advanced to ſpeak with their countrymen who ſerved under the French banners; but this conference was declined by the enemy. Then the French Indians having uttered the horrible ſcream called the war-whoop, which by this time had loſt its effect among the Britiſh forces, the enemy began the action with great impetuoſity: but they met with ſuch a warm reception in front, while the Indian auxiliaries fell upon them in flank, that in a little more than half an hour their whole army was routed, their general, with all his officers, taken, and the purſuit continued through the woods for ſeveral miles with conſiderable ſlaughter.

This battle, which happened on the twenty-fourth day of July, having been fought in ſight of the French garriſon at Niagara, ſir William Johnſon ſent major Harvey with a trumpet to the commanding officer, to preſent him with a liſt of the ſeventeen officers taken in the engagement, and adviſe him to ſurrender before more blood was ſhed, while he had it in his power to reſtrain the Indians. The commandant having certified himſelf of the truth, by ſending an officer to viſit the priſoners, agreed to treat, and in a few hours the capitulation was ſigned. The garriſon, conſiſting of ſix hundred and ſeven effective men, marched out with the honours of war, in order to be embarked in veſſels on the lake, and conveyed in the moſt expeditious manner to New York. They laid down their arms when they embarked, but were permitted to keep their baggage, and, by a proper eſcort, protected from the ſavage inſolence and rapacity of the Indians. All the women were conducted, at their own requeſt, to Montreal; and the ſick and wounded, who could not bear the fatigue of travelling, were treated with humanity.

This was the ſecond complete victory gained, in the courſe of the ſame war, by ſir William Johnſon, who, without the help of a military education, ſucceeded ſo ſignally in the field by dint of innate courage and natural ſagacity. What remarkably diſtinguiſhed theſe battles, is the circumſtance of his having taken in both the commander of the enemy. Nor was he more ſerviceable to his country by his valour and conduct in the field, than by the influence and authority which his juſtice, benevolence, and integrity, had acquired him among the Indian tribes of the Six Nations, whom he not only aſſembled at Niagara, to the number of eleven hundred, but alſo reſtrained within the bounds of good order and moderation.

The reduction of Niagara, and the poſſeſſion of Crown-Point, were exploits much more eaſily accompliſhed than the conqueſt of Quebec, the great object to which all theſe ſubordinate operations tended, and of which we now come to give an account. It was about the middle of February that a conſiderable ſquadron ſailed from England for Cape Breton, under the command of the admirals Saunders and Holmes, two gentlemen of worth and probity, who had on ſeveral occaſions ſignalized their courage and conduct in the ſervice of their country. By the twenty-firſt day of April they were in ſight of Louiſbourg: but the harbour was blocked up with ice in ſuch a manner, that they were obliged to bear away for Halifax in Nova Scotia. From thence rear-admiral Durell was detached with a ſmall ſquadron, to ſail up the river St. Laurence as far as the iſle de Coudres, in order to intercept any ſupplies from France intended for Quebec: he accordingly took ſome ſtore-ſhips; but he was anticipated by ſeventeen ſail of ſhips, loaded with proviſion, ſtores, and ſome recruits, under convoy of three frigates, which had already reached the capital of Canada. Mean while, admiral Saunders arrived at Louiſbourg; and the troops being embarked, to the number of eight thouſand, proceeded up the river without further delay.

The operations at land were intruſted to the conduct of major-general James Wolfe, who had ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Louiſbourg; and his ſubordinates in command were the brigadiers Monckton, Townſhend, and Murray; all four in the flower of their age, who had ſtudied the military art with equal application and proficiency, and though young in years, were old in experience. The firſt was a ſoldier by deſcent, the ſon of major-general Wolfe, a veteran officer of acknowleged capacity: the other three reſembled each other, not only in years, qualifications, and ſtation, but alſo in family-rank, all three being the ſons of noblemen. The ſituation of brigadier Townſhend was ſingular: he had ſerved abroad in the laſt war with reputation, and reſigned his commiſſion during the peace, in diſdain of ſome hard uſage he had received from his ſuperiors. That his military talents, however, might not be loſt to his country, he exerciſed them with equal ſpirit and perſeverance in projecting the plan of a national militia. When the command and direction of the army devolved to a new leader, ſo predominant in his breaſt was the ſpirit of patriotiſm and the love of glory, that though heir-apparent to a Britiſh peerage, poſſeſſed of a very affluent fortune, remarkably dear to his acquaintance, and ſolicited to a life of quiet by every allurement of domeſtic felicity, he nobly diſregarded theſe meaner conſiderations: he burſt from all entanglements; proffered his ſervice to his ſovereign; expoſed himſelf to the perils of a diſagreeable voyage, the rigours of a ſevere climate, and the hazards of a campaign peculiarly fraught with toil, danger, and difficulty.

The armament intended for Quebec ſailed up the river St. Laurence without any interruption, or having encountered any of thoſe difficulties and perils with which the navigation of that river had been ſaid to be attended. Their good fortune in this particular, indeed, was owing to ſome excellent charts of the river, which had been found in veſſels taken from the enemy. About the latter end of June the land forces were diſembarked in two diviſions upon the iſle of Orleans, ſituated a little below Quebec, a large fertile iſland, well cultivated, producing plenty of grain, abounding with people, villages, and plantations. General Wolfe no ſooner landed on the iſland of Orleans than he diſtributed a manifeſto among the French coloniſts, importing, That the king his maſter, juſtly exaſperated againſt the French monarch, had equipped a conſiderable armament in order to humble his pride, and was determined to reduce the moſt conſiderable French ſettlements in America: that it was not againſt the induſtrious peaſants, their wives and children, nor againſt the miniſters of religion, that he intended to make war: on the contrary, he lamented the misfortunes to which they muſt be expoſed by the quarrel: he offered them his protection, and promiſed to maintain them in their temporal poſſeſſions, as well as in the free exerciſe of their religion, provided they would remain quiet, and take no part in the difference between the two crowns. He obſerved, that the Engliſh were maſters of the river St. Laurence, ſo as to intercept all ſuccours from Europe; and had, beſides, a powerful army on the continent, under the command of general Amherſt: that the reſolution they ought to take was neither difficult nor doubtful, as the utmoſt exertion of their valour would be uſeleſs, and ſerve only to deprive them of the advantages which they might reap from their neutrality: that the cruelties exerciſed by the French upon the ſubjects of Great Britain in America, would excuſe the moſt ſevere repriſals; but Britons were too generous to follow ſuch barbarous examples. He again offered to the Canadians the ſweets of peace amidſt the horrors of war; and left it to themſelves to determine their own fate by their own conduct. He expreſſed his hope that the world would do him juſtice, ſhould they oblige him, by rejecting theſe favourable terms, to adopt violent meaſures. He expatiated upon the ſtrength and power, as well as the generoſity of Great Britain, in thus ſtretching out the hand of humanity; a hand ready to aſſiſt them on all occaſions, even when France was, by her weakneſs, compelled to abandon them in the moſt critical conjuncture.

This declaration produced no immediate effect; nor indeed could the Canadians be perſuaded to depend upon the ſincerity and faith of a nation whom their prieſts had induſtriouſly repreſented as the moſt ſavage and cruel enemy on earth. Poſſeſſed of thoſe notions, which prevailed even among the better ſort, they choſe to abandon their habitations, and expoſe themſelves and families to certain ruin, in provoking the Engliſh by the moſt cruel hoſtilities, rather than be quiet, and confide in the general's promiſe of protection. Inſtead of purſuing this prudent plan of conduct, they joined the ſcalping parties of Indians who ſkulked among the woods, and iſſuing forth among the Engliſh ſtragglers, butchered them with the moſt inhuman barbarity. Mr. Wolfe, whoſe nature revolted againſt ſuch wanton and perfidious cruelty, ſent a letter to the French general, repreſenting, that ſuch enormities were contrary to the rules of war eſtabliſhed among civilized nations, diſhonourable to the ſervice of France, and diſgraceful to human nature: he therefore deſired the French coloniſts and Indians might be reſtrained within due bounds, otherwiſe he would burn their villages, deſolate their plantations, and retaliate upon the perſons of his priſoners whatever cruelty ſhould, in the ſequel, be committed on the ſoldiers or ſubjects of his maſter. In all probability the French general's authority was not ſufficient to bridle the ferocity of the ſavages, who continued to ſcalp and murder with the moſt brutal appetite for blood and revenge; ſo that Mr. Wolfe, in order to intimidate the enemy into a ceſſation of theſe outrages, found it neceſſary to connive at ſome irregularities in the way of retaliation.

M. de Montcalm, who commanded the French troops, though ſuperior in number to the Engliſh, wiſely determined to depend upon the natural ſtrength of the country, rather than run the riſk of a general engagement in the field. The city of Quebec was ſkilfully fortified, defended with a numerous garriſon, and plentifully ſupplied with proviſion and ammunition. Montcalm had reinforced the troops of the colony with five regular battalions, formed of the beſt of the inhabitants; and completely diſciplined all the Canadians of the neighbourhood capable of bearing arms, with the ſeveral tribes of ſavages. With this army he had taken poſt, in a very advantageous ſituation, along the ſhore of Beaumont, from the river St. Charles to the Falls of Montmorenci, every acceſſible part of his camp being deeply intrenched. To undertake the ſiege of Quebec againſt ſuch odds and advantages, was not only a deviation from the eſtabliſhed maxims of war, but a raſh enterprize, ſeemingly repugnant to the dictates of common ſenſe.

Mr. Wolfe was well acquainted with all the difficulties of the undertaking; but he knew at the ſame time he ſhould always have it in his power to retreat, in caſe of emergency, while the Britiſh ſquadron maintained its ſtation in the river: he was not without hope of being joined by general Amherſt; and he was ſtimulated by an appetite for glory, which no proſpect of danger could entirely overcome. Underſtanding that there was a body of the enemy poſted with cannon at the Point of Levi, on the ſouth ſhore, oppoſite to the city of Quebec, he detached againſt them brigadier Monckton, at the head of four battalions, who paſſed the river at night; and next morning, having ſkirmiſhed with ſome of the enemy's irregulars, obliged them to retire from that poſt, which the Engliſh immediately occupied. At the ſame time colonel Carlton, with another detachment, took poſſeſſion of the weſtern point of the iſland of Orleans; and both theſe poſts were fortified, in order to anticipate the enemy, who, had they kept poſſeſſion of either, might have rendered it impoſſible for any ſhip to lie at anchor within two miles of Quebec. Beſides, the Point of Levi was within cannon-ſhot of the city, againſt which a battery of mortars and artillery was immediately erected. Montcalm, foreſeeing the effect of this expedient, detached a body of ſixteen hundred men acroſs the river, to attack and deſtroy the works before they were completed: but this detachment fell into diſorder, fired upon each other, and fled in the utmoſt confuſion. The battery being finiſhed without further interruption, the cannon and mortars began to play with ſuch ſucceſs, that in a little time the upper town was conſiderably damaged, and the lower town entirely demoliſhed.

Mean while, the fleet was expoſed to the moſt imminent danger. Immediately after the landing the troops on the iſland of Orleans, the wind increaſed to a furious ſtorm, which blew with ſuch violence that many tranſports ran foul of one another, and were diſabled; a number of boats and ſmall craft foundered, and ſeveral large ſhips loſt their anchors. The enemy reſolving to take advantage of the confuſion produced, as they believed, by this terrible tempeſt, prepared ſeven fire-ſhips, and at midnight ſent them down from Quebec among the tranſports, which lay ſo thick as to cover the whole ſurface of the river. The ſcheme, though well contrived and ſeaſonably executed, was entirely defeated by the vigilance of the Britiſh admiral, and the dexterity of his mariners, who reſolutely boarded the fire-ſhips, and towed them faſt aſhore, where they lay burning to the water's edge, without having done the leaſt prejudice to the Engliſh ſquadron. On the very ſame day of the ſucceeding month, they ſent down a raft of fire-ſhips, or radeaus, which were likewiſe conſumed, without producing any effect.

The works for the ſecurity of the hoſpital, and the ſtores on the iſland of Orleans, being completed, the Britiſh forces croſſed the north channel in boats, and landing under the cover of two ſloops, encamped on the ſide of the river Montmorenci, which ſeparated them from the left of the enemy; and next morning a company of rangers, poſted in a wood to cover ſome workmen, were attacked by the French Indians, and put to flight: however, the neareſt troops advancing, repulſed the Indians in their turn with conſiderable loſs. The reaſons that induced general Wolfe to chuſe this ſituation by the Falls of Montmorenci, in which he was divided from Quebec by this and another river called St. Charles, he explained in a letter to the ſecretary of ſtate. He obſerved that the ground he had choſen was high, and in ſome meaſure commanded the oppoſite ſide, on which the enemy was poſted: that there was a ford below the falls, paſſable in every tide for ſome hours at the latter part of the ebb, and beginning of the flood; and he hoped that means might be found of paſſing the river higher up, ſo as to fight the marquis de Montcalm upon leſs diſadvantageous terms than thoſe of directly attacking his intrenchments. Accordingly, in reconnoitring the river Montmorenci, a ford was diſcovered about three miles above; but the oppoſite bank, which was naturally ſteep and covered with woods, the enemy had fortified in ſuch a manner as to render it almoſt inacceſſible. The eſcorte was twice attacked by the Indians, who were as often repulſed; but theſe rencounters coſt the Engliſh about forty men killed and wounded, including ſome officers.

On the eighteenth day of July the admiral, at the general's requeſt, ſent two ſhips of war, two armed ſloops, and ſome tranſports, having troops on board, up the river; and they paſſed the city of Quebec without having met with any obſtruction. The general being on board of this little armament, carefully ſurveyed the banks on the ſide of the enemy, which were extremely difficult, from from the nature of the ground; and theſe difficulties were further increaſed, by the foreſight and precaution of the French commander. Though a deſcent ſeemed impracticable between the city and Cape Rouge, where it was intended, general Wolfe, with a view to divide the enemy's force, and obtain intelligence, ordered a detachment, under the command of colonel Carlton, to land higher up, at the Point au Tremble; to which place, he was informed, a good number of the inhabitants of Quebec had retired with their moſt valuable effects. This ſervice was performed with little loſs, and ſome priſoners were brought away; but no magazine was diſcovered.

The general, thus diſappointed in his expectation, returned to Montmorenci, where brigadier Townſhend had, by maintaining a ſuperior fire acroſs that river, prevented the enemy from erecting a battery, which would have commanded the Engliſh camp; and now he determined to attack them, notwithſtanding their advantageous ſituation, and the incredible pains they had taken to render their camp abſolutely impregnable. His deſign was, firſt, to reduce a detached redoubt cloſe to the water's edge, ſeemingly ſituated within gunſhot of the intrenchment on the hill. Should this fortification be defended by the enemy, he foreſaw that he ſhould be able to bring on a general engagement: on the contrary, ſhould they remain tame ſpectators of its reduction, he could afterwards examine their ſituation at leiſure, and fix upon the place at which they could be moſt eaſily attacked.

Diſpoſitions were accordingly made for ſtorming the redoubt. On the laſt day of July, in the forenoon, part of brigadier Monckton's brigade was embarked in the boats of the fleet, to be tranſported from the Point of Levi. The two brigades commanded by the brigadiers Townſhend and Murray were drawn out, in order to croſs the ford when it ſhould be found neceſſary. To facilitate their paſſage, the admiral had ſtationed the Centurion ſhip of war in the channel, to check the fire of the lower battery, by which the ford was commanded: a numerous train of artillery was planted upon the eminence, to batter and enfilade the left of the enemy's intrenchment; and two flat-bottomed armed veſſels, prepared for the purpoſe, were run aground near the redoubt, to favour the deſcent of the forces. The manifeſt confuſion produced among the French by theſe previous ſteps, and by the fire of the Centurion, which was plied with great activity, determined Mr. Wolfe to ſtorm this intrenchment without further delay. Orders were given, that the three brigadiers ſhould put their troops in motion at a certain ſignal, which was accordingly made at a proper time of the tide.

Many of the boats from Point Levi ran aground upon a ledge that runs off a conſiderable diſtance from the ſhore; and this accident occaſioned a diſorder, by which ſo much time was loſt, that the general was obliged to ſtop the march of brigadier Townſhend's corps, which he obſerved to be in motion. In the mean time, the boats were floated and ranged in proper order, though expoſed to a ſevere fire of ſhot and ſhells; and the general, in perſon ſounding the ſhore, pointed out the place where the troops might diſembark with the leaſt oppoſition. Thirteen companies of grenadiers, and two hundred men of the ſecond American battalion, were the firſt who landed. They had received orders to form in four diſtinct bodies, and begin the attack, ſuſtained by the corps of brigadier Monckton, as ſoon as the other troops ſhould have croſſed the ford, and be near enough to contribute their aſſiſtance. Theſe inſtructions, however, were entirely neglected. Before Mr. Monckton had landed, and while brigadier Townſhend was on his march at a conſiderable diſtance, the grenadiers, without waiting to be drawn up in any regular form, impetuouſly ruſhed towards the enemy's intrenchments in the utmoſt confuſion. Their courage ſerved only to increaſe their misfortune. They were received by ſuch a violent and ſteady fire from the enemy, that, unable to ſtand the repeated vollies, they took ſhelter under the redoubt which the French had abandoned at their approach. In this uncomfortable ſituation they continued ſome time, incapable of forming under ſo hot a fire, notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts of many gallant officers, who laviſhly expoſed, and even loſt their lives, in attempting to bring them into ſome kind of order.

The general, ſeeing all their endeavours ineffectual, ordered them to retreat and form behind Monckton's brigade, which was by this time landed, and drawn up on the beach. They accordingly retired in confuſion, leaving a conſiderable number lying on the field, to the barbarity of the Indian ſavages, who butchered the living and ſcalped the dead, even in ſight of their indignant companions. This unhappy accident occaſioned a new delay, and the day was already far advanced. The wind began to blow with uncommon violence, and the tide to make; ſo that, in caſe of a ſecond repulſe, the retreat of brigadier Townſhend might have been rendered hazardous and uncertain. Mr. Wolfe therefore thought proper to deſiſt, and returned without further moleſtation to the other ſide of the river Montmorenci. The admiral ordered the two veſſels which were aground to be ſet on fire, that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy. The circumſtances that determined the general to make the attack on this ſide conſiſted in the following particulars: all the artillery could be uſed with good effect; all the troops could act at once; and, in caſe of a miſcarriage, the retreat was ſecure and open, at leaſt for a certain time of the tide. Theſe advantages, however, ſeemed to have been counterbalanced by other conſiderations. The enemy were poſted on a commanding eminence; the beach was covered with deep mud, ſlippery, and broken into holes and gullies; the hill was ſteep, and in ſome places inacceſſible; the enemy were numerous, ſtrongly intrenched, and defended by a formidable artillery. Had the attack ſucceeded, the loſs of the Engliſh muſt have been very conſiderable in compariſon of that of the enemy; becauſe the neighbouring woods afforded theſe laſt immediate ſhelter; and the river St. Charles remained to be paſſed before the town could be regularly inveſted.

Immediately after this ſevere check, in which above five hundred men and many brave officers were killed, the general detached brigadier Murray with twelve hundred men in tranſports, above the town, to act in concert with rear-admiral Holmes, whom the admiral had ſent up with ſome force againſt againſt the French ſhipping, which he hoped to deſtroy. The brigadier was likewiſe directed to ſeize every opportunity of fighting the enemy's detachments, and even of provoking them to battle. In purſuance of theſe inſtructions, he twice attempted to land on the north ſhore, but found it impracticable: the third attempt was more ſucceſsful; he made a ſudden deſcent at Chambaud, and burned a conſiderable magazine, filled with arms, cloathing, proviſion, and ammunition. The enemy's ſhips being moored in ſuch a poſture as to be out of the reach of all danger, and nothing elſe occurring that required the brigadier's longer ſtay, he returned to the camp, with intelligence procured from his priſoners, that the fort of Niagara was taken, Crown-Point abandoned, and general Amherſt employed in making preparations to attack the corps poſted at the iſle aux Noix, under M. Burlemaque.

This information, however, though extremely agreeable, brought no proſpect of the approach of any aſſiſtance from that quarter. The ſeaſon waſted apace. The general fell violently ill; conſumed by care, watching, and fatigue, too great to be ſupported by a delicate conſtitution, and by a body unequal to that vigorous and enterpriſing ſoul which it contained. It was not enough for him to eſcape from ſo great an expedition uncondemned and unapplauded: to be pitied was, he thought, but a milder kind of cenſure; and he knew that no military conduct can ſhine, unleſs it be gilded by ſucceſs. His own high notions, the expectations of the public, the good ſucceſs of other commanders, all turned inward upon him, and converted diſappointment into diſeaſe. As ſoon as he had a little recovered, he diſpatched an expreſs with an account of his proceedings, to England, written indeed in the ſtile of deſpondency, but with ſuch perſpicuity, clearneſs, and elegance, as would have ranked him among our beſt writers, if his military exploits had not placed him among our greateſt commanders.

He reſolved, when he ſent away his account, to continue the campaign to the laſt poſſible moment; and, after a conſultation with his officers, determined, that any further attempts at Montmorenci would be to little purpoſe; and that their principal operations ought to be carried on above the town, in order, if poſſible, to draw the enemy to an engagement. This reſolution, however, was not adopted until the general and admiral had reconnoitred the town of Quebec, with a view to a general aſſault; and concluded from their own obſervation, reinforced by the opinion of the chief engineer, who was perfectly well acquainted with the interiors of the place, that ſuch an attack could not be hazarded with any proſpect of ſucceſs. The ſhips of war indeed might have ſilenced the batteries of the lower town, but they could not affect the upper works, from which they muſt have ſuſtained conſiderable damage.

When we conſider the ſituation of this place, and the fortifications with which it was ſurrounded; the natural ſtrength of the country; the great number of veſſels and floating batteries they had provided for the defence of the river; the ſkill, valour, ſuperior force, and uncommon vigilance of the enemy; their numerous bodies of ſavages continually hovering about the poſts of the Engliſh, to ſurpriſe parties and harraſs detachments; we muſt own, that there was ſuch a combination of difficulties as might have diſcouraged and perplexed the moſt reſolute and intelligent commander.

In conſequence of the reſolution taken to quit the camp at Montmorenci, the troops and artillery were reimbarked, and landed at Point Levi: they afterwards paſſed up the river in tranſports, while admiral Holmes made a movement with his ſhips, to amuſe the enemy poſted on the north ſhore: and the men being much crowded on board, the general ordered one half of them to be landed for refreſhment on the other ſide of the river. As no poſſibility appeared of attacking the enemy above the town, the ſcheme of operations was entirely changed. The three brigadiers formed and preſented a plan for conveying the troops farther down in boats, and landing them in the night within a league of Cape Diamond, in hope of aſcending the Heights of Abraham, which riſe abruptly with a ſteep aſcent from the banks of the river, that they might take poſſeſſion of the ground on the back of the city, where it was but indifferently fortified.

The dangers and difficulties attending the execution of this deſign were ſo peculiarly diſcouraging, that one would imagine it could not have been embraced but by a ſpirit of enterprize that bordered on deſpair. The ſtream was rapid, the ſhore ſhelving, the bank of the river lined with centinels, the landing-place ſo narrow as to be eaſily miſſed in the dark, and the ground ſo difficult as hardly to be ſurmounted in the day-time, had no oppoſition been expected. If the enemy had received the leaſt intimation from ſpy or deſerter, or even ſuſpected the ſcheme; had the embarkation been diſordered, in conſequence of the darkneſs of the night, the rapidity of the river, or the ſhelvineſs of the north ſhore, near which they were obliged to row; had one centinel been alarmed, or the landing-place much miſtaken; the Heights of Abraham muſt have been inſtantly ſecured, by ſuch a force as would have rendered the undertaking abortive; confuſion would have neceſſarily enſued in the dark; and this would have naturally produced a panic, which might have proved fatal to the greater part of the detachment. Theſe objections could not eſcape the penetration of the gallant Wolfe, who nevertheleſs adopted the plan without heſitation, and even executed it in perſon, though at that time greatly enfeebled by the ſevere dyſentery and fever with which he had lately been afflicted.

The neceſſary preparations being made, and the time fixed for this hazardous attempt, admiral Holmes moved with his ſquadron farther up the river, about three leagues above the place appointed for the diſembarkation, that he might deceive the enemy and amuſe M. de Bougainville, whom Montcalm had detached with fifteen hundred men to attend the motions of that ſquadron; but the Engliſh admiral was ordered to ſail down the river in the night, ſo as to protect the landing of the forces; and theſe orders he punctually obeyed. On the twelfth day of September, an hour after midnight, the firſt embarkation, conſiſting of four complete regiments, the light infantry, commanded by colonel Howe, a detachment of Highlanders, and the American grenadiers, was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of the the brigadiers Monckton and Murray; though general Wolfe accompanied them in perſon, and was among the firſt who landed, and they began to fall down with the tide to the intended place of diſembarkation, rowing cloſe to the north ſhore, in order to find it the more eaſily. Without any diſorder the boats glided gently along; but, by the rapidity of the tide, and the darkneſs of the night, the boats overſhot the mark, and the troops landed a little below the place at which the diſembarkation was intended.

As the troops landed, the boats were ſent back for the ſecond embarkation, which was ſuperintended by brigadier Townſhend. In the mean time colonel Howe, with the light infantry and the Highlanders, aſcended the woody precipices with admirable courage and activity; and diſlodged a captain's guard, which defended a ſmall intrenched narrow path, by which alone the reſt of the forces could reach the ſummit. Then they mounted without farther moleſtation from the enemy, and the general drew them up in order as they arrived. Monſieur de Montcalm was no ſooner informed that the Engliſh had gained the Heights of Abraham, which in a manner commanded the town on its weakeſt part, than he determined to hazard a battle, and began his march without delay, after having aſſembled his whole force from the ſide of Beauport.

General Wolfe obſerving the enemy croſſing the river St. Charles, began to form his own line, which conſiſted of ſix battalions and the Louiſbourg grenadiers; the right commanded by brigadier Monckton, and the left by brigadier Murray: to the rear of the left colonel Howe was poſted with his light infantry, juſt returned from a four gun battery, which they had taken without oppoſition. M. de Montcalm advancing in ſuch a manner as to ſhew his intention was to flank the left of the Engliſh, brigadier Townſhend was ſent thither with the regiment of Amherſt, which he formed en potence, preſenting a double front to the enemy: he was afterwards reinforced by two battalions; and the reſerve conſiſted of one regiment drawn up in eight ſubdivſions, with large intervals. The right of the enemy was compoſed of half the colony troops, two battalions, and a body of Canadians and ſavages: their center conſiſted of a column, formed by two other regular battalions; and on the left one battalion, with the remainder of the colony troops, was poſted: the buſhes and corn-fields in their front were lined with fifteen hundred of their beſt markſmen, who kept up an irregular galling fire, which proved fatal to many brave officers, thus ſingled out for deſtruction.

This fire indeed was, in ſome meaſure, checked by the advanced poſts of the Britiſh line, who piqueered with the enemy for ſome hours before the battle began. Both armies were deſtitute of artillery, except two ſmall pieces on the ſide of the French, and a ſingle gun, which the Engliſh ſeamen had made ſhift to draw up from the landing-place. This was very well ſerved, and galled their column ſeverely. At length, about nine in the morning, the enemy advanced to the charge with great order and reſolution, though their fire was irregular and ineffectual. On the contrary, the Britiſh forces reſerved their ſhot until the French had approached within forty yards of their line; then they poured in a terrible diſcharge, and continued the fire with ſuch activity and ſpirit as could not fail to produce a very conſiderable effect. General Wolfe was ſtationed on the right, at the head of Bragg's regiment and the Louiſbourg grenadiers, where the attack was moſt warm. As he ſtood conſpicuous in the front of the line, he had been aimed at by the enemy's markſmen, and received a ſhot in the wriſt, which however did not oblige him to quit the field. Having wrapped a handkerchief round his hand, he continued giving orders without the leaſt emotion, and advanced at the head of the grenadiers, with their bayonets fixed, when another ball unfortunately pierced the breaſt of this young hero, who fell in the arms of victory, juſt as the enemy gave way; for at this very inſtant every ſeparate regiment of the Britiſh army ſeemed to exert itſelf for the honour of its own peculiar character.

While the right preſſed on with their bayonets, brigadier Murray briſkly advanced with the troops under his command, and ſoon broke the center of the enemy; then the Highlanders drawing their broad ſwords, fell in among them with irreſiſtible impetuoſity, and drove them with great ſlaughter into the town and the works they had raiſed at the bridge of the river St. Charles. On the left and rear of the Engliſh the action was not ſo violent: ſome of the light infantry had thrown themſelves into houſes, where, being attacked, they defended themſelves with great courage and reſolution. Colonel Howe having taken poſt with two companies behind a ſmall corps, ſallied out frequently on the flanks of the enemy during this attack, and often drove them into heaps, while brigadier Townſhend advanced platoons againſt their front; ſo that the right wing of the French were totally prevented from executing their firſt intention. The brigadier himſelf remained with Amherſt's regiment to ſupport this diſpoſition, and to overawe a body of ſavages poſted oppoſite to the light infantry, waiting for an opportunity to fall upon the rear of the Britiſh army.

General Wolfe being ſlain, and at the ſame time Mr. Monckton dangerouſly wounded at the head of Laſcelles's regiment, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf with remarkable gallantry, the command devolved to brigadier Townſhend, who haſtened to the centre; and finding the troops diſordered in the purſuit, formed them again with uncommon expedition. This neceſſary taſk was ſcarce performed when M. de Bougainville, with a body of two thouſand freſh men, appeared in the rear of the Engliſh. He had begun his march from Cape Rouge, as ſoon as he received intelligence that the Britiſh troops had gained the Heights of Abraham; but did not come up in time to have any ſhare in the battle. Mr. Townſhend immediately ordered two battalions, with two pieces of artillery, to advance againſt this officer, who retired at their approach among woods and ſwamps, where general Townſhend was too wiſe to hazard a precarious attack. He had already gained a complete victory, taken a great number of French officers, and was poſted in a very advantageous ſituation, which it would have been imprudent to forego.

The French general M. de Montcalm was mortally wounded in the battle, and conveyed into Quebec, from whence, before he died, he wrote a letter to general Townſhend, recommending the priſoners to that generous humanity by which the Britiſh nation has been always diſtinguiſhed. His ſecond in command was left wounded on the field, and next day expired on board an Engliſh ſhip, to which he had been carried. About one thouſand of the enemy were made priſoners, including a great number of officers; and about five hundred were ſlain on the field of battle. The wreck of their army, after they had reinforced the garriſon of Quebec, retired to Port au Tremble, from whence they proceeded to Jaques Quartiers, where they remained intrenched, until they were compelled by the ſeverity of the weather to make the beſt of their way to Trois Rivieres and Montreal.

This important victory was obtained at the expence of fifty-ſix men killed, including nine officers, and of five hundred and ſix men wounded; but the death of general Wolfe was a national loſs, univerſally lamented. This gentleman was formed by nature for military greatneſs; his memory was retentive, his judgment ſound, and his comprehenſion amazingly quick and clear: his conſtitutional courage was not only uniform and daring, perhaps in the extreme, but he poſſeſſed that higher ſpecies of it, if I may be allowed the expreſſion, that ſtrength, ſteadineſs, and activity of mind, which no difficulties could obſtruct, nor dangers deter. With an unuſual livelineſs, almoſt to impetuoſity of temper, he was not ſubject to paſſion; with the greateſt independence of ſpirit, free from pride: generous, almoſt to profuſion, he contemned every little art for the acquiſition of wealth, whilſt he ſearched after objects for his charity and beneficence: the deſerving ſoldier never went unrewarded; and even the needy inferior officer frequently taſted of his bounty. Conſtant and diſtinguiſhing in his attachments; manly and unreſerved; yet gentle, kind, and conciliating in his manners: he enjoyed a long ſhare of the friendſhip, and almoſt the univerſal good-will of mankind; and to crown all, ſincerity and candour, a true ſenſe of honour, juſtice, and public liberty, ſeemed the inherent principles of his nature, and the uniform rule of his conduct.

He betook himſelf, when very young, to the profeſſion of arms; and with ſuch talents, joined to the moſt unwearied aſſiduity, no wonder that he was ſo ſoon ſingled out as a moſt riſing military genius. Even ſo early as the battle of La Feldt, when ſcarce twenty years of age, he exerted himſelf in ſo maſterly a manner, and at a very critical juncture, that it drew the higheſt encomiums from the great officer then at the head of our army. During the whole of that war he went on forming the military character; was preſent at every engagement, and never paſſed undiſtinguiſhed. Even after the peace, whilſt others lolled on pleaſure's downy lap, he was cultivating the arts of war. He introduced, without one act of ſeverity, ſuch regularity and exactneſs of diſcipline in his corps, that as long as the ſix Britiſh battalions on the Plains of Minden are recorded in the annals of Europe, ſo long will Kingſley's ſtand amongſt the foremoſt of that day. Of that regiment he continued lieutenant-colonel, till the great miniſter, who rouſed the ſleeping genius of his country, called him forth into higher ſpheres of action. He was early in the moſt ſecret conſultations for the attack of Rochefort; and what he would have done there, and what he afterwards did at Louiſbourg, are freſh in every one's memory.

He was ſcarce returned from thence when he was appointed to command the important expedition againſt Quebec. There his abilities ſhone forth in their brighteſt luſtre: in ſpite of many unforeſeen difficulties, from the nature of the ground, from the great ſuperiority of the enemy, the ſtrength of the place itſelf, and his own bad ſtate of health, he perſevered with unwearied diligence, practiſing every ſtratagem of war to effect his purpoſe: at laſt, in conjunction with his ſubordinates in command, he formed and executed that great, that dangerous, yet neceſſary plan, which drew out the French to their defeat, and will for ever denominate him the conqueror of Canada. But there—tears will flow—there, when within the graſp of victory, he received a wound, firſt in his wriſt, and then in his breaſt, which obliged him to be carried off to a ſmall diſtance, in the rear, where rouſed from fainting in the laſt agonies, by the ſound of they run, he eagerly aſked, "Who run?" and being told, the French, and that they were defeated, he ſaid, "Then I thank God; I die contented;" and almoſt inſtantly expired.

Immediately after the battle of Quebec, admiral Saunders, who, together with his ſubordinates Durell and Holmes, had all along co-operated heartily with the land forces for the advantage of the ſervice, ſent up all the boats of the fleet, with artillery and ammunition; and on the ſeventeenth day of the month ſailed up, with all the ſhips of war, in a diſpoſition to attack the lower town, while the upper part ſhould be aſſaulted by general Townſhend. This gentleman had employed the time from the day of action in fortifying the camp with redoubts, in forming a military road for the cannon, in drawing up the artillery, preparing batteries, and cutting off the enemy's communication with the country. On the ſeventeenth, before any battery could be erected, a flag of truce was ſent from the town with propoſals of capitulation; which, being maturely conſidered by the general and admiral, were accepted and ſigned at eight next morning.

They granted the more favourable terms, as the enemy continued to aſſemble in the rear of the Britiſh army; as the ſeaſon was become wet, ſtormy, and cold; threatening the troops with ſickneſs, and the fleet with accident; and as a conſiderable advantage would accrue from taking poſſeſſion of the town while the walls were in a ſtate of defence. What rendered the capitulation ſtill more fortunate for the Britiſh general was, the information he afterwards received from deſerters, importing, that the enemy had rallied, and were reinforced behind Cape Rouge, under the command of M. de Levy, arrived from Montreal for that purpoſe, with two regular battalions; and that M. de Bougainville, at the head of eight hundred men, with a convoy of proviſions, was actually on his march to throw himſelf into the town on the eighteenth, that very morning on which it was ſurrendered: for the place was not then completely inveſted, as the enemy had broke their bridge of boats, and poſted detachments in very ſtrong works, on the other ſide of the river St. Charles.

The capitulation was no ſooner ſigned than the Britiſh forces took poſſeſſion of Quebec on the land ſide, and guards were poſted in different parts of the town, to preſerve order and diſcipline: at the ſame time captain Palliſer, with a body of ſeamen, entered the lower town and took the ſame precautions. Next day about a thouſand priſoners were embarked on board of tranſports, which ſet ſail for France with the firſt opportunity: in the mean time, the inhabitants of the country came in great numbers, to deliver up their arms, and take the oath of fidelity to the Engliſh government. The death of Montcalm, which indeed was an irreparable loſs to France, in all probability overwhelmed the enemy with conſternation, and confounded all their councils; otherwiſe we cannot account for the tame ſurrender of Quebec to a handful of troops, even after the victory they had obtained: for although the place was not regularly fortified on the land ſide, and moſt of the houſes were in ruins, their walls and parapets had not yet ſuſtained the leaſt damage: the beſiegers were hardly ſufficient to complete the inveſtiture: a freſh army was aſſembled in the neighbourhood, with which their communication continued open; the ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, that the Britiſh troops in a little time muſt have been forced to deſiſt, by the ſeverity of the weather, and even retire with their fleet before the approach of winter, which never fails to freeze up the river St. Laurence.

When the news of this deciſive action arrived in England, we all remember, though it is very difficult to deſcribe, the various and mixed emotions with which every one was affected. But two days before this came, was received the expreſs which general Wolfe had ſent off after the miſcarriage at Montmorenci. When the general doubted, the public thought they had reaſon to deſpair. But whilſt this gloom was freſh, and in the midſt of the general deſpondency, a ſecond expreſs arrived, and brought, all at once, an account of the victory, the taking of Quebec, and the death of general Wolfe. The effect of ſuch joyful news, immediately on the back of ſuch a dejection, and then the mixture of grief and pity which attended the public congratulations and applauſes, was very ſingular and affecting. The ſort of mourning triumph which manifeſted itſelf on that occaſion, did equal honour to the memory of the general and to the humanity of the nation. The king expreſſed his ſatisfaction, by conferring the honour of knighthood upon captain Douglas, whoſe ſhip brought the firſt tidings of this ſucceſs; and gratified him and colonel Hale with conſiderable preſents. A day of ſolemn thankſgiving was appointed by proclamation through all the dominions of Great Britain. The city of London, the univerſities, and many other corporations of the kingdom, preſented congratulatory addreſſes to his majeſty. The parliament was no ſooner aſſembled than the ſecretary of ſtate, in the houſe of commons, with that energy of eloquence peculiar to himſelf, expatiated upon the ſucceſſes of the campaign, the tranſcendent merit of the deceaſed general, and the conduct and courage of the admirals and officers who aſſiſted in the conqueſt of Quebec. In conſequence of this harangue, and the motion by which it was ſucceeded, the houſe unanimouſly reſolved to preſent an addreſs, deſiring his majeſty would order a monument to be erected in Weſtminſter-abbey, to the memory of major-general Wolfe. At the ſame time they paſſed another reſolution, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to the ſurviving generals and admirals employed in the glorious and ſucceſsful expedition to Quebec. Teſtimonies of this kind, while they reflect the greateſt honour on thoſe who receive them, ſerve at the ſame time to excite the ambition of other commanders to merit the like diſtinction.

The people of England were ſo elevated by the aſtoniſhing ſucceſs of this campaign, which was alſo proſperous on the continent of Europe, that, far from expreſſing the leaſt uneaſineſs at the heavy burthens they were obliged to bear, they, with a ſpirit peculiar to the Britiſh nation, voluntarily raiſed large contributions to purchaſe warm jackets, ſtockings, ſhoes, coats, and blankets, for the ſoldiers who were expoſed to the rigours of an inclement ſky, in Germany and America. But they diſplayed a more noble proof of univerſal benevolence, extended even to foes. The French miniſtry, ſtraitned in their finances, which were found ſcarce ſufficient to ſupport the war, had ſacrificed their duty to their king, and every ſentiment of compaſſion for his unhappy ſubjects, to a thirſt of vengeance, and ſanguinary views of ambition. They had withdrawn the uſual allowance from their ſubjects who were detained priſoners in England; and theſe wretched captives, amounting in number to near twenty thouſand, were left to the mercy of thoſe enemies whom their ſovereign had taken ſuch pains to exaſperate. The allowance which they received from the Britiſh government effectually ſecured them from the horrors of famine: but ſtill they remained deſtitute of other conveniencies, and particularly expoſed to the miſeries of cold and nakedneſs. The generous Engliſh beheld theſe forlorn captives with ſentiments of ſympathy and compaſſion: they conſidered them as their fellow-creatures and brethren in humanity, and forgot their country while they beheld their diſtreſs. A conſiderable ſubſcription was raiſed in their behalf, and in a few weeks they were completely cloathed by the charity of the Britiſh benefactors. This act of beneficence was certainly one of the nobleſt triumphs of the human mind, which even the moſt inveterate enemies of Great Britain cannot help regarding with reverence and admiration.

The city of Quebec being reduced, together with great part of the adjacent country, brigadier Townſhend, who had accepted his commiſſion with the expreſs proviſo that he ſhould return to England at the end of the campaign, furniſhed it with a garriſon of five thouſand effective men, victualled from the fleet, under the command of brigadier Murray; and embarking with admiral Saunders, arrived in Great Britain about the beginning of winter. As for brigadier Monckton, he was conveyed to New York, where he happily recovered of his wound.

Nor were the arms of Great Britain leſs ſucceſsful in the Eaſt than in the Weſt Indies. We have already obſerved that general Lally had formed a reſolution to undertake the ſiege of Madraſs, and made made mighty preparations for that purpoſe. In the month of October he had marched into Arcot without oppoſition, and in the beginning of December he proceeded towards Madraſs. On the twelfth he marched over Choultry Plain in three diviſions, cannonaded by the Engliſh artillery with conſiderable effect, and took poſt at Egmore and St. Thome. Colonel Laurence, who commanded the garriſon of Madraſs, retired to the iſland, in order to prevent the enemy from taking poſſeſſion of the iſland bridge; and at the ſame time ordered the poſts to be ſecured in the back town, or ſuburbs of Madraſs.

In the morning of the fourteenth, the enemy advancing with their whole force to attack this place, the Engliſh detachments withdrew into the garriſon; and in leſs than an hour a grand ſally was made, under the command of colonel Draper, a gallant officer, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf remarkably on this occaſion. He fell upon the regiment of Lorraine with great impetuoſity; and, in all probability, would have cut them to pieces, had not they been ſupported by the arrival of a freſh brigade. After an obſtinate diſpute, in which many officers, and a good number of men were ſlain on both ſides, colonel Draper was obliged to retreat, not altogether ſatisfied with the conduct of his grenadiers. As the garriſon of Madraſs was not very numerous, nothing further was attempted on their ſide without the works. In the mean time the enemy proceeded, with great expedition, to erect their batteries againſt the fort and town; which being opened on the ſixth day of January, maintained a continued diſcharge of ſhot and ſhells for twenty days, advancing their trenches all the time under cover of this fire, until they reached the breaſt of the glacis. There they erected a battery of four pieces of cannon, and opened it on the laſt day of the month; but for five days ſucceſſively, they were obliged to cloſe their embraſures by the ſuperior fire of the fort, and at length to abandon it intirely: nevertheleſs, they ſtill maintained a ſevere fire from the firſt grand battery, which was placed at the diſtance of four hundred and fifty yards from the defences. This artillery was ſo well ſerved, as to diſable twenty-ſix pieces of cannon, three mortars, and effect an inconſiderable breach. Perhaps they might have had more ſucceſs, had they battered in breach from the beginning; but Mr. Lally, in order to intimidate the inhabitants, had cruelly bombarded the town, and demoliſhed the houſes: he was, however, happily diſappointed in his expectation, by the wiſe and reſolute precautions of governor Pigot; by the vigilance, conduct, and bravery of the colonels Laurence and Draper, ſeconded by the valour and activity of Major Brereton, and the ſpirit of the inferior officers.

The artillery of the garriſon was ſo well directed, that, from the fifth day of February, the fire of the enemy gradually decreaſed from twenty-three to ſix pieces of cannon: nevertheleſs, they advanced their ſap along the ſea-ſide, ſo as to undermine the north-eaſt angle of the covered way, from whence their muſquetry drove the beſieged. They likewiſe endeavoured to open a paſſage into the ditch by a mine; but ſprung it ſo injudiciouſly, that they could make no advantage of it, as it lay expoſed to the fire of ſeveral cannon. While theſe operations were carried on before the town, Major Gaillaud with a body of ſipoys, ſome of the country horſe, and a few Europeans, drawn from the Engliſh garriſons of Tiruchenappaly and Chingliput, hovered at the diſtance of a few miles; blocking up the roads in ſuch a manner, that the enemy were obliged, four ſeveral times, to ſend large detachments againſt him, in order to open the communication; by which means the progreſs of the ſiege was in a great meaſure retarded.

On the ſixteenth day of February in the evening, the Queenborough ſhip of war, commanded by captain Kempenfelt, and the company's ſhip the Revenge, arrived in the road of Madraſs, with a reinforcement of ſix hundred men, belonging to colonel Draper's regiment: and part of them was immediately diſembarked. From the beginning of the ſiege, the enemy had diſcovered a backwardneſs in the ſervice, which ſeemed to promiſe them but little ſucceſs. They were ill ſupplied by their commiſſaries and contractors: they were diſheartened by the obſtinate defence of the garriſon; and all their hopes were intirely extinguiſhed by the arrival of this reinforcement. After a briſk fire, they raiſed the ſiege that very night, leaving behind them forty pieces of cannon; and, having deſtroyed the powder mills at Ogmore, withdrew into the territory of Arcot.

The Engliſh forces in the Eaſt-Indies, being as yet too weak to make head againſt Lally in the field, little detached expeditions were planned and executed with equal ſpirit and ſagacity. Colonel Ford, who commanded the troops in Bengal, attacked and defeated the French commander Conflans, in the neighbourhood of Maſulipatam, which he afterwards entered in triumph. At the ſame time captain Richard Maitland ſet out from Bombay, with fifteen hundred ſipoys, and nine hundred Europeans, on an expedition againſt the ſipoys who occupied the town and caſtle of Surat.

In the month of February, he embarked with his troops on board of the company's armed veſſels, and in a few days arrived at a place called Dentiloury, about nine miles from Surat; and here he quartered his troops for refreſhment: in two days he advanced againſt the French garden, in which a conſiderable number of the enemy was poſted, and drove them from thence after a very obſtinate diſpute.

Then he erected a battery, from which he battered the wall in breach: but this method appearing dilatory, he called a council of war compoſed of the land and ſea-officers, and laid before them the plan of a general attack, which was accordingly executed next morning. The company's grab, and the bomb-ketches, being warped up the river in the night, were diſpoſed in a line of battle oppoſite to the Bundar, which was the ſtrongeſt fortification that the enemy poſſeſſed; and under the fire of theſe, the troops being landed, took the Bundar by aſſault. The outer town being thus reduced, he forthwith began to bombard the inner town and caſtle with ſuch fury, that next morning they both ſurrendered, on condition that the inhabitants ſhould march out with their effects; and captain Maitland took poſſeſſion without further diſpute. This conqueſt, which coſt about two hundred men, including a few officers, was atchieved with ſuch expedition, that he returned to Bombay by the ninth day of April.

The main body of the Engliſh forces, which had been poſted at Madraſs, for the ſecurity of that important ſettlement, took the field after the ſiege was raiſed, and poſſeſſed themſelves of Conjiveram, a place of great conſequence, which, with the fort of Schengelpel, commanded all the adjacent country, and covered the Britiſh poſſeſſions to the northward. Mr. Lally, ſenſible of the importance of this poſt, took the ſame route, in order to diſlodge them; but finding all his attempts ineffectual, he withdrew towards Wandewaſh, where his troops were put into quarters of cantonment. Nothing elſe of moment was performed till the month of September, when major Brereton, who commanded the Engliſh forces, being joined by major Gordon with three hundred men of colonel Coote's battalion, reſolved to attack the enemy in his turn. On the fourteenth day of the month he began his march from Conjiveram for Wandewaſh, at the head of four hundred Europeans, ſeven thouſand ſipoys, ſeventy European, and three hundred black horſe, with fourteen pieces of artillery. During his route he inveſted and took the fort of Trivitar, from whence he advanced to the village of Wandewaſh, where the French, to the number of one thouſand, were ſtrongly encamped under the guns of a fort commanded by a Raja, mounting twenty cannon, under the direction of a French gunner. On the thirtieth day of September the Engliſh, at two in the morning, attacked the village in three different places, and drove them from it, after a very obſtinate diſpute; but this advantage they were not able to maintain. The black pioneers ran away during the attack, ſo that proper traverſes could not be made in the ſtreets; and at day-break the fort poured in upon them a prodigious diſcharge of grape-ſhot with conſiderable effect. The enemy had retired to a dry ditch, which ſerved as an intrenchment, from whence they made furious ſallies; and a body of three hundred European horſe were already in motion, to fall upon their rear and complete their confuſion. In this emergency they retired in diſorder, and might have been entirely ruined, had not the body of reſerve effectually covered their retreat; yet this could not be effected without the loſs of ſeveral officers, and above three hundred men killed and wounded. After this mortifying check, they encamped a few days in ſight of the fort, and the rainy ſeaſon ſetting in, returned to Conjiveram. The garriſon of Wandewaſh was afterwards reinforced by French and ſipoys, and the other troops of the enemy were aſſembled by brigadier general de Buſſy at Arcot.

During theſe tranſactions at land, the ſuperiority at ſea was ſtill diſputed between the Engliſh and French admirals. On the firſt day of September vice-admiral Pocock ſailed from Madraſs to the ſouthward, in queſt of the enemy, and next day diſcovered the French fleet, conſiſting of fifteen ſail, ſtanding to the northward. He forthwith threw out the ſignal for a general chace, and ſtood towards them with all the ſail he could carry; but the wind abating, he could not approach near enough to engage. During the three ſucceeding days he exerted his utmoſt endeavours to bring them to a battle, which they ſtill declined; and at laſt they diſappeared. He then bent his courſe towards Pondicherry, on the ſuppoſition that they were bound to that harbour, and on the eighth day of the month obſerved them ſtanding to the ſouthward; but he could not bring them to an engagement till the tenth, when M. d'Apche, about two in the afternoon, made the ſignal for battle, and the cannonading began without further delay. The Britiſh ſquadron conſiſted only of nine ſhips of the line; the enemy's fleet amounted to eleven; but they had ſtill a greater advantage in number of men and weight of metal. Both ſquadrons fought with incredible obſtinacy till about ten minutes after four, when the enemy's rear began to give way; this example was ſoon followed by their center: and finally the van, with the whole ſquadron, bore away to the ſouth ſouth-eaſt with all the canvas they could ſpread. The Britiſh ſquadron had ſuffered ſo much in their maſts and rigging that they could not purſue; ſo that M. d'Apche was allowed to retreat without moleſtation.

On the fifteenth admiral Pocock returned to Madraſs, where his ſquadron being refitted by the twenty-ſixth, he ſailed again to Pondicherry, and in the road ſaw the enemy lying at anchor in line of battle. The wind being off ſhore, he made the line of battle a-head, and for ſome time continued in this ſituation. At length the French admiral weighed anchor, and came forth; but inſtead of bearing down upon the Engliſh ſquadron, which had fallen to leeward, he kept cloſe to the wind, and ſtretched away to the ſouthward. Admiral Pocock finding him averſe to another engagement, and his own ſquadron being in no condition to purſue, he, with the advice of his captains, deſiſted, and returned once more to the harbour of Madraſs. On the ſide of the Engliſh above three hundred men were killed in the engagement, including captain Michie, who commanded the Newcaſtle, captain Gore of the marines, two lieutenants, a maſter, gunner, and boatſwain; the captains Somerſet and Brereton, with about two hundred and fifty men, were wounded, and many of the ſhips conſiderably damaged. The loſs of the enemy was, in all probability, much more conſiderable, inaſmuch as, notwithſtanding their great ſuperiority in number of ſhips, weight of metal, and complements of men, they made they beſt of their way to the iſland of Mauritius, in order to be refitted, having on board general Lally and ſome other officers. Thus they left the Engliſh maſters of the Indian coaſt; a ſuperiority ſtill more confirmed by the arrival of rear-admiral Corniſh, with four ſhips of the line, who had ſet ſail from England in the beginning of the year, and joined admiral Pocock at Madraſs on the eighteenth day of October.

The Dutch had, during the courſe of the preſent war, maintained a moſt puſillanimous, and, in ſome reſpects, a moſt inſidious neutrality; and they now proceeded in the Eaſt Indies to open acts of hoſtility. The great extenſion of the Engliſh trade in the kingdom of Bengal had excited the envy and jealouſy of the Dutch factory, who poſſeſſed a ſtrong fort at Chinchura, in the river of Bengal, and determined, if poſſible, to engroſs to themſelves the whole ſaltpetre branch of commerce. They had, without doubt, tampered with the new Nabob, who lay under ſuch obligations to the Engliſh, and probably ſecured his connivance. Their ſcheme was approved by the governor of Batavia, who undertook to put it in execution; and for that purpoſe choſe the opportunity when the Britiſh ſquadron had retired to the coaſt of Malabar. On pretence of reinforcing the Dutch garriſons in Bengal, he equipped an armament of ſeven ſhips, having on board five hundred European troops and ſix hundred Malayeſe, under the command of colonel Ruſſel. This armament having touched at Negapatam, proceeded up the bay, and arrived in the river of Bengal about the beginning of October.

Colonel Clive, who then reſided at Calcutta, had received intimation of their deſign, which he was determined at all events to defeat. He complained to the Subah, who, upon ſuch application, could not decently refuſe an order to the director and council of Hughley, forbidding this armament to proceed up the river. The colonel at the ſame time ſent a letter to the Dutch commodore, importing, that as he had received information of their deſign, he could not permit them to land forces and march to Chinchura. In anſwer to this intimation, the Dutch commodore, whoſe whole fleet had not yet arrived, aſſured the Engliſh commander that he had no intention to ſend any forces to Chinchura, and begged liberty to land ſome of his troops for refreſhment; a favour which was granted, on condition that they ſhould not advance.

Notwithſtanding the Subah's order, and his own engagement to this effect, the reſt of the ſhips were no ſooner arrived than he proceeded up the river to the neighbourhood of Tannah fort, where his troops were landed, and began their march to Chinchura. In the mean time, by way of revenging the affront he pretended to have received, in being denied a paſſage to their own factory, he took ſeveral ſmall veſſels on the river belonging to the Engliſh company; and the Calcutta Indiaman, commanded by captain Wilſon, homeward-bound, ſailing down the river, the Dutchman ſent word to him, that if he attempted to paſs he would ſink him to the bottom. The Engliſh captain ſeeing them run out their guns as if they really intended to put their threats in execution, returned to Calcutta, where two other ſhips lay at anchor, and reported his adventure to colonel Clive, who forthwith ordered the three ſhips to prepare for battle, and attack the Dutch armament.

The ſhips being properly manned, and their quarters lined with ſaltpetre, they fell down the river, and found the Dutch ſquadron drawn up in line of battle, in order to oppoſe their paſſage, which it muſt be acknowleged they ſeemed able to effect; for three of them were mounted with thirty-ſix guns each, three of them with twenty-ſix, and the ſeventh carried ſixteen. The Duke of Dorſet, commanded by captain Forreſter, being the firſt that approached them, dropped anchor cloſe to their line, and began the engagement with a broadſide, which was immediately returned. A dead calm unfortunately enſuing, this ſingle ſhip was for a conſiderable time expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy; but a ſmall breeze ſpringing up, the Calcutta and the Hardwicke advanced to her aſſiſtance, and a ſevere fire was maintained on both ſides, till two of the Dutch ſhips ſlipping their cables, bore away, and a third was driven aſhore. Their commodore being thus weakened, after a few broadſides, ſtruck his flag to captain Wilſon, and the other three followed his example. The victory being thus obtained, without the loſs of one man on the ſide of the Engliſh, captain Wilſon took poſſeſſion of the prizes, the decks of which were ſtrewed with carnage, and ſent the priſoners to colonel Clive at Calcutta.

The detachment of troops which they had landed, to the number of eleven hundred men, met with a check no leſs mortifying. Colonel Clive being informed that they were in full march to Chinchura, detached colonel Forde with five hundred men from Calcutta, in order to oppoſe and put a ſtop to their march at the French gardens. He accordingly proceeded to the northward, and entered the town of Chandenagore, where he was ſuddenly attacked by a Dutch party ſent out from Chinchura to join and conduct the expected reinforcement. Theſe being routed and diſperſed, after a ſhort engagement, colonel Forde in the morning advanced to a plain in the neighbourhood of Chinchura, where he found the enemy prepared to give him battle, on the twenty-fifth day of November. They even began the action with great ſpirit and activity; but found the fire of the Engliſh artillery and battalion ſo intolerably hot, that they ſoon gave way, and were totally defeated. A conſiderable number were ſlain, and the greater part of thoſe who ſurvived the battle were taken priſoners. During this conteſt the Nabob, at the head of a conſiderable army, maintained a ſuſpicious neutrality; and in all likelihood would have joined with the Dutch, had they proved victorious, as he had reaſon to believe they would, from their great ſuperiority in number. But fortune no ſooner declared in favour of the Engliſh, than he made a tender of his ſervice to the victor, and even offered to ſubdue Chinchura with his own army.

In the mean time, propoſals of accommodation being made to him by the directors and council of the Dutch factory at Chinchura, a negociation was ſet on foot, and a treaty concluded, to the ſatisfaction of all parties. Above three hundred of the priſoners enliſted into the ſervice of Great Britain; the reſt embarked on board the ſhips, which were reſtored as ſoon as the peace was ratified, and immediately departed for the ſettlement of Batavia.

The Engliſh company were ſtill more ſucceſsful on the coaſt of Coromandel. The governor and council of Madraſs having received intelligence that the French general, Lally, had detached a ſtrong body of troops to the ſouthward, advanced to Syringham, and menaced Tiruchenapally with a ſiege, it was determined that colonel Coote, who had lately arrived from England, ſhould take the field, and endeavour to ſtop his progreſs. He accordingly began his march at the head of two thouſand one hundred Europeans, including cavalry, and three thouſand blacks, with fourteen pieces of cannon and one howitzer. On the twenty-ſeventh day of November he laid ſiege to the fort of Wandewaſh: having made a practicable breach, the garriſon, amounting to near nine hundred men, ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war; and here he found forty-nine pieces of cannon, with a great quantity of ammunition. Then he inveſted the fortreſs of Carangoly, a place commanded by colonel O'Konnely, at the head of one hundred Europeans and five hundred ſipoys. In a few days he diſmounted the greater part of their guns, and they ſubmitted, on condition that the Europeans ſhould be allowed to march out with the honours of war; but the ſipoys were diſarmed and diſmiſſed.

General Lally, alarmed at the progreſs of this brave, vigilant, and enterpriſing officer, collected all his forces at Arcot, to the number of two thouſand two hundred Europeans, including horſe, three hundred Cofferies, and ten thouſand black troops or ſipoys, with twenty-five pieces of cannon. Of theſe he aſſumed the command in perſon, and on the tenth of January began his march in order to recover Wandewaſh. Colonel Coote having received information on the twelfth that he had taken Conjiveram, endeavoured by a forced march to regain this place, which they accordingly abandoned at his approach, and proſecuting their route to Wandewaſh, inveſted the fort without delay. The Engliſh commander paſſed the river Palla, in order to march towards the ſame quarter; and, on the twenty-firſt day of the month, underſtanding that a breach was already made, determined to give them battle without further heſitation.

The cavalry being formed, and ſuſtained by five companies of ſipoys, he advanced againſt the enemy's horſe, which, being at the ſame time galled by two pieces of cannon, retired in diſorder. Then colonel Coote, having taken poſſeſſion of a tank which they had abandoned, returned to the line, which was by this time drawn up in order of battle. Obſerving the men in high ſpirits, and eager to engage, he ordered the whole army to advance; and by nine in the morning they were within two miles of the enemy's camp, where they halted about half an hour. During this interval, the colonel examined the ſituation of the French forces, who were very advantageouſly poſted, and made a movement to the right, which conſtrained them to alter their diſpoſition. They now advanced, in their turn, within three quarters of a mile of the Engliſh line; and the cannonading began with great fury on both ſides. About noon their European cavalry coming up with a reſolute air to attack the left of the Engliſh, colonel Coote brought up ſome companies of ſipoys and two pieces of cannon, to ſupport the horſe which were ordered to oppoſe them; and theſe advancing, fell upon their flank with ſuch fury that they broke, and were driven by the Engliſh cavalry above a mile from the left, upon the rear of their own army.

Mean while, both lines continued advancing towards each other, and about one o'clock the firing with ſmall arms began with great vivacity. One of the French tumbrils being blown up by an accidental ſhot, the Engliſh commander took immediate advantage of their confuſion. He ordered major Brereton to wheel Draper's regiment to the left, and ſuddenly to charge the enemy in flank. This ſervice was performed with ſuch reſolution and ſucceſs, that the left wing of the French was completely routed, and fell upon their center, now cloſely engaged with the left of the Engliſh. About two in the afternoon their whole line gave way, and fled towards their own camp, which, obſerving themſelves cloſely purſued, they precipitately abandoned, together with twenty-two pieces of cannon. In this engagement they loſt about eight hundred men, killed and wounded, beſides about fifty priſoners, including brigadier-general de Buſſy, the chevalier Godeville, quarter-maſter-general, lieutenant-colonel Murphy, three captains, five lieutenants, and ſome other officers. On the ſide of the Engliſh, two hundred and ſixty two were killed and wounded, and among the former the brave and accompliſhed major Brereton, whoſe death was univerſally lamented.

General Lally having retreated with his broken troops to Pondicherry, the baron de Vaſſerot was detached towards the ſame place with a thouſand horſe and three hundred ſipoys, to ravage and lay waſte the French territory. In the mean time, the indefatigable colonel Coote undertook the ſiege of Chilliput, which in two days was ſurrendered by the chevalier de Tilly, himſelf and his garriſon remaining priſoners of war. The ſame too was the fate of fort Timmery, which being reduced, the colonel continued his march to Arcot, the capital of the province, againſt the fort of which he opened his batteries on the fifth of February. When he had carried on his approaches within ſixty yards of the creſt of the glacis, the garriſon, conſiſting of two hundred and fifty Europeans, and near three hundred ſipoys, ſurrendered as priſoners of war; and here the Engliſh commander found twenty-two pieces of cannon, four mortars, and a great quantity of all kind of military ſtores. Thus the campaign was gloriouſly finiſhed with the conqueſt of Arcot, after the French army had been routed and ruined by the diligence of colonel Coote, whoſe courage, conduct, and activity, cannot be ſufficiently admired. The reader will obſerve that, rather than interrupt the thread of ſuch an intereſting narration, I have ventured to encroach upon the annals of the year 1760.

Having thus given a particular detail of all the remarkable tranſactions that diſtinguiſhed this year in Europe, Africa, America, and Aſia, I ſhall now proceed, as uſual, to cloſe it with taking notice of ſome domeſtic events; which, though not very important in themſelves, may nevertheleſs merit a place in a general hiſtory. In the beginning of the year the court of London received the melancholy news of the death of the princeſs-dowager of Orange and Naſſau, governante of the United Provinces, in the fiftieth year of her age, and during the minority of her ſon the preſent ſtadtholder. Feeling her end approaching, ſhe delivered a key to one of her attendants, directing him to fetch two papers, which ſhe ſigned with her own hand. One was a contract of marriage between her daughter and the prince of Naſſau Weilburg: the other was a letter to the States-general, beſeeching them to conſent to this marriage, and preſerve inviolate the regulations ſhe had made touching the education and tutelage of the young ſtadtholder. Theſe two papers being ſigned and ſealed, ſhe ſent for her children, exhorted them to make a proper improvement of the education they had received, and to live in harmony with each other. Then ſhe implored heaven to ſhower down its bleſſings on them both, and embraced them with the moſt affecting marks of maternal tenderneſs. She afterwards continued to converſe converſe calmly and deliberately with her friends, and in a few hours expired.

She was the eldeſt daughter of his Britannic majeſty, poſſeſſed of many perſonal accompliſhments and exemplary virtues; pious, moderate, ſenſible, and circumſpect. She had exerciſed her authority with equal ſagacity and reſolution; reſpected even by thoſe who were no friends to the houſe of Orange; and died with great fortitude and reſignation. In her will ſhe appointed the king her father, and the princeſs-dowager of Orange her mother-in-law, honorary tutors, and prince Louis of Brunſwic acting tutor to her children.

In the morning after her deceaſe, the States-general and the ſtates of Holland were extraordinarily aſſembled; and having received notice of this event, proceeded to confirm the regulations which had been made for the minority of the ſtadtholder. Prince Louis of Brunſwic was invited to aſſiſt in the aſſembly of Holland, where he took the oaths as repreſenting the captain-general of the union. Then he communicated to the aſſembly the act by which the princeſs had appointed him guardian of her children. He was afterwards invited to the aſſembly of the States-general, who agreed to the reſolution of Holland with reſpect to his guardianſhip; and in the evening the different colleges of the government ſent formal deputations to the young ſtadtholder and the princeſs Caroline his ſiſter, in whoſe names and preſence they were received, and anſwered by their guardian and repreſentative. A formal intimation of the death of the princeſs was tranſmitted to the king her father, in a pathetic letter, by the States-general, deploring the loſs which he, as well as they, had ſuffered by this melancholy event; and aſſuring him they would employ all their care and attention in ſecuring and defending the rights and intereſts of the young ſtadtholder and the princeſs his ſiſter, whom they conſidered as the children of the republic. The royal family of England ſuſtained another heavy ſtroke in the courſe of this year, by the deceaſe of the princeſs Elizabeth-Caroline, ſecond daughter of his late royal highneſs Frederic prince of Wales, a lady of the moſt engaging manners, who died at Kew in the month of September, before ſhe had attained the nineteenth year of her age.

Whether the ſanguinary ſpirit, which never fails to accompany a long and vigorous war, unhappily contributed at this period to render the temper of the Engliſh more ſavage than uſual, or whether other cauſes leſs viſible might not co-operate in producing this effect; certain it is, the preſent year was diſtinguiſhed by ſome murders remarkable for inſtances of the moſt ſhocking barbarity. One Halſey, who commanded a merchant ſhip in the voyage from Jamaica to England, having conceived ſome perſonal diſlike to a poor ſailor, named Davidſon, inſulted him with ſuch abuſe, expoſed him to ſuch hardſhips, and puniſhed him with ſuch wantonneſs of cruelty, that the poor wretch leaped overboard in deſpair. His inhuman tyrant envying him that death, which would have reſcued a miſerable object from his brutality, plunged into the ſea after him, and brought him on board, declaring he ſhould not eſcape while there were any torments left to inflict. Accordingly, he exerciſed his tyranny upon him with redoubled rigour, tied him to the ſhrouds with a cord, and beat him for ſome time with ſuch violence, that in a few hours after the poor creature expired. This ſavage ruffian was likewiſe indicted for the murder of another mariner, called Edwards; but being convicted on the firſt trial, the ſecond was found unneceſſary, and the criminal ſuffered death according to the law, which is perhaps too mild for malefactors convicted of ſuch aggravated cruelty.

Another barbarous murder was committed in the country near Birmingham, upon a ſheriff's officer, by the ſons of one Darby, whoſe effects the bailiff had ſeized on a diſtreſs for rent. The two young aſſaſſins, encouraged by the father, attacked the unhappy wretch with clubs, and mangled him in a terrible manner, ſo that he hardly retained any ſigns of life. Not contented with this cruel execution, they ſtripped him naked, and dragging him out of the houſe, ſcourged him with a waggoner's whip, until the fleſh was cut from his bones. In this miſerable condition he was found weltering in his blood, and conveyed to a neighbouring houſe, where he immediately expired. The three barbarians were apprehended, after having made a deſperate reſiſtance. They were tried, convicted, and executed: the ſons were hung in chains, and the body of the father diſſected.

One Mrs. Walker, the widow of a timber-merchant at Rotherhithe, being cruelly murdered in her own houſe, Mary Edmonſon, a young woman her niece, ran out into the ſtreet with her arms cut acroſs, and gave the alarm, declaring her aunt had been aſſaſſinated by four men, who forced their way into the houſe, and that ſhe (the niece) had received thoſe wounds in attempting to defend her relation. According to the circumſtances that appeared, this unnatural wretch had cut the throat of her aunt and benefactreſs with a caſe-knife, then dragged the body from the waſh-houſe to the parlour; that ſhe had ſtole a watch and ſome ſilver ſpoons, and concealed them, together with the knife and her own apron, which was ſoaked with the blood of the deceaſed.

After having acted this ſhocking tragedy, at the bare recital of which the humane reader muſt ſhudder with horror, ſhe put on another apron, and wounded her own fleſh, the better to conceal her guilt. Notwithſtanding theſe precautions ſhe was ſuſpected, and committed to priſon. Being brought to trial, ſhe was convicted and condemned upon circumſtantial evidence, and finally executed at Kennington Common, though ſhe denied the fact to the laſt moment of her life. At the place of execution ſhe behaved with great compoſure, and, after having ſpent ſome minutes in devotion, proteſted ſhe was innocent of the crime laid to her charge.

What ſeemed to corroborate this proteſtation, was the condition and character of this young woman, who had been educated in a ſphere above the vulgar, and maintained a reputation without reproach in the country, where ſhe was actually betrothed to a clergyman. On the other hand, the circumſtances that appeared againſt her almoſt amounted to a certainty; though nothing weaker than proof poſitive ought to determine a jury in capital caſes to give a verdict againſt the perſon accuſed.

A miſ-

A miſcreant, whoſe name was Haines, having eſpouſed the daughter of a farmer in the neighbourhood of Glouceſter, who poſſeſſed an eſtate of eighty pounds a year, which he intended to divide among ſeven children, was ſo abandoned as to form the deſign of poiſoning the whole family, that, in right of his wife, he might enjoy the whole inheritance. For the execution of this infernal ſcheme, he employed his own father to procure him a quantity of arſenic; part of which he adminiſtered to three of the children, who were immediately ſeized with the dreadful ſymptoms produced by this mineral, and the eldeſt expired. He afterwards mixed it with three apple-cakes which he bought for the purpoſe, and preſented to the other three children, who underwent the ſame terrible convulſions which had proved fatal to the eldeſt brother. The inſtantaneous effects of the poiſon occaſioned a ſuſpicion of Haines, who being ſeized and examined, the whole ſcene of villany was diſcloſed. Nevertheleſs, the villain found means to eſcape.

In the month of April five French priſoners, confined on board the king's ſhip the Royal Oak, were convicted of having murdered one Jean de Manaux, their countryman and fellow-priſoner, in revenge for his having diſcovered that they had forged paſſes to facilitate their eſcape. Enraged at this detection, they ſeized this unfortunate informer in the place of their confinement, gagged his mouth, ſtripped him naked, tied him with a ſtrong cord to a ring-bolt, and ſcourged his body with ſuch ſavage cruelty, as almoſt put an end to his life. By dint of ſtruggling the poor wretch diſengaged himſelf from the cord with which he had been tied; and being unable to ſtand, fell upon his back; then they finiſhed the tragedy, by leaping and ſtamping on his breaſt, till the cheſt was broke, and he expired. They afterwards divided the body into ſmall pieces, and conveyed it through the neceſſary into the ſea, becauſe the throwing it over-board would have alarmed the centry. Next day twenty-ſeven of the French priſoners being carried on ſhore, one of them gave information of the murder; in conſequence of which the criminals were ſecured, brought to trial, condemned, and puniſhed with death.

Nor were the inſtances of cruel aſſaſſination which prevailed at this juncture confined to Great Britain. At the latter end of the foregoing year an atrocious maſſacre was perpetrated by two Genoeſe mariners, upon the maſter and crew of an Engliſh veſſel, among whom they were inrolled. Theſe monſters of cruelty were in different watches, a circumſtance that favoured the execution of the horrid plan they had concerted. When one of them retired to reſt with his fellows of the watch, conſiſting of the mate and two ſeamen, he waited till they were faſt aſleep, and then butchered them all with a knife. Having ſo far ſucceeded without diſcovery, he returned to the deck and communicated the exploit to his aſſociate; then they ſuddenly attacked the maſter of the veſſel, and cleft his head with an hatchet, which they likewiſe uſed in murdering the man who ſtood at the helm; a third was likewiſe diſpatched, and no Engliſhman remained alive but the maſter's ſon, a boy, who lamented his father's death with inceſſant tears and cries for three days; at the expiration of which he was likewiſe ſacrificed, becauſe the aſſaſſins were diſturbed by his clamour.

This barbarous tragedy was acted within ſixty leagues of the Rock of Liſbon; but the veſſel was taken between the capes Ortugal and Finiſterre by the captain of a French privateer called La Favourite, who ſeeing the deck ſtained with blood, and finding all the papers of the ſhip deſtroyed, began to ſuſpect that the maſter and crew had been murdered. He accordingly taxed them with the murder, and they confeſſed the particulars. The privateer touched at Vigo, where the captain imparted this detail to the Engliſh conſul; but the prize, with the two villains on board, was ſent to Bayonne in France, where it is to be hoped, for the honour of humanity, they were brought to condign puniſhment, notwithſtanding the war that ſubſiſted between the two nations; for there are certain eſtabliſhed rights of general juſtice and humanity which no particular war can deſtroy.

A maſſacre, if poſſible ſtill more ſhocking and horrid, was committed about the ſame time by a negro at St. Euſtatia. This man being at work on a ſhip in the harbour, and having had ſome words with a white perſon, ſtabbed him in his paſſion; upon which another negro told him that he would certainly be put to death for this cruel murder, and that he could be ſubjected to no greater puniſhment if he had killed twenty more. The fellow, rendered deſperate by this intimation, ſnatched up a knife, and throwing himſelf into the water, ſwam immediately to ſhore. The firſt perſon he met happened to be an Engliſh ſailor, and him he cut acroſs the belly in ſuch a manner that his bowels came out. This done, he ruſhed in a moment into a woollen-draper's ſhop, and ſtabbed the apprentice, who was ſitting behind the counter: then he ran into the ſtreet, and dangerouſly wounded two or three others. By this time the people were greatly alarmed; but the fellow being deſperate, every body ſhunned him. The governor offered a reward to any one who would ſeize him alive, and a ſailor undertook it, armed with a muſket; but if he found it impracticable, he was ordered to ſhoot him. The negro, who was then at the wharf-ſide, alone, ſaw him coming, and met him with great reſolution. He made an eſſay to ſtab the ſailor, by giving a ſudden leap upon him; but the tar avoided the blow, and ſtruck him with the butt-end of the muſket ſo as to break his arm. Upon this the negro, with great agility, ſeized the knife in the other hand, and made another puſh at the ſailor, but with as little ſucceſs as before; and by another blow he was, with the aſſiſtance of ſome other perſons who had gathered round, ſecured alive. He was immediately brought to trial, and condemned; and next day hung alive in irons upon a gibbet, where he continued in the moſt violent agonies, and ſhrieking in the moſt terrible manner for the ſpace of three days. His greateſt cry was for water, the weather being then extremely hot, and the ſun beating full upon him.

I ſhall conclude this bloody regiſter with the account of a murder, remarkable in all its circumſtances, for which a perſon, called Eugene Aram, ſuffered at York in the courſe of this year. This man, who exerciſed the profeſſion of a ſchool-maſter at Knareſborough, had, as far back as the year 1745, been concerned with one Houſeman in robbing and murdering Daniel Clarke, whom they had previouſly perſuaded to borrow a conſiderable quantity of valuable effects from different perſons in the neighbourhood, on falſe pretences, that he might retire with the booty. He accordingly filled a ſack with theſe particulars, and begun his retreat with his two perfidious aſſociates, who ſuddenly fell upon him, deprived him of life, and, having buried the body in a cave, took poſſeſſion of the plunder. Though Clarke diſappeared at once in ſuch a myſterious manner, no ſuſpicion fell upon the aſſaſſins; and Aram, who was the chief contriver and agent in the murder, moved his habitation to another part of the country.

In the ſummer of the preſent year, Houſeman being employed, among other labourers, in repairing the public highway, they, in digging for gravel by the road-ſide, diſcovered the ſkeleton of a human creature, which the majority ſuppoſed to be the bones of Daniel Clarke. This opinion was no ſooner broached than Houſeman, as it were by ſome ſupernatural impulſe which he could not reſiſt, declared that it was not the ſkeleton of Clarke, inaſmuch as his body had been interred in a place called St. Robert's Cave, where they would find it with the head turned to a certain corner. He was immediately apprehended, examined, admitted as evidence for the crown, and diſcovered the particulars of the murder.

The ſkeleton of Clarke having been found exactly in the place and manner he had deſcribed, Eugene Aram, who now acted as uſher to a grammar ſchool in the county of Norfolk, was ſecured, and brought to trial at the York aſſizes. There, his own wife corroborating the teſtimony of Houſeman, he was found guilty, and received ſentence, notwithſtanding a very artful and learned defence, in which he proved, from argument and example, the danger of convicting a man upon circumſtantial evidence. Finding all his remonſtrances ineffectual, he recommended himſelf in pathetic terms to the king's mercy; and if ever murder was intitled to indulgence, perhaps it might have been extended, not improperly, to this man, whoſe genius, in itſelf prodigious, might have exerted itſelf in works of general utility. He had, in ſpite of all the diſadvantages attending a low birth and ſtraitened circumſtances, by the dint of his own capacity and application, made conſiderable progreſs in mathematics and philoſophy, acquired all the languages ancient and modern, and executed part of a Celtic dictionary, which, had he lived to finiſh it, might have thrown ſome light upon the origin and obſcurities of the European hiſtory.

Convinced, at laſt, that he had nothing to hope from the clemency of the government, he wrote a ſhort poem in defence of ſuicide; and on the day fixed for his execution, opened the veins of his left arm with a razor which he had concealed for that purpoſe. Though he was much weakened by the effuſion of blood before this attempt was diſcovered; yet, as the inſtrument had miſſed the artery, he did not expire till he was carried to the gibbet and underwent the ſentence of the law. His body was conveyed to Knareſborough-foreſt, and hung in chains near the place where the murder was committed. Theſe are ſome of the moſt remarkable inſtances of homicide that appeared in the courſe of this year, which was more diſtinguiſhed than almoſt any preceding one for barbarous acts of this nature.

His preſent majeſty, then prince of Wales, having, in the beginning of June, entered the twenty-ſecond year of his age, the anniverſary of his birth was celebrated with great rejoicings at court, and the king received compliments of congratulation on the majority of a prince, who ſeemed born to fulfil the hopes and complete the happineſs of Great Britain. The city of London preſented an addreſs to the king on this occaſion, replete with expreſſions of loyalty and affection, aſſuring his majeſty that no hoſtile threats could intimidate a people animated by the love of liberty, who, confiding in the Divine Providence, and in his majeſty's experienced wiſdom and vigorous councils, were reſolved to exert their utmoſt efforts towards enabling their ſovereign to repel the inſults and defeat the attempts made by the ancient enemies of his crown and kingdom.

Congratulations of the ſame kind were offered by other cities, towns, corporations, and communities, who vied with each other in profeſſions of attachment; and indeed there was not the leaſt trace of diſaffection perceivable at this juncture in any part of the iſland.

So little were the citizens of London diſtreſſed by the expence, or incommoded by the operations of the war, that they found leiſure to plan and funds to execute magnificent works of art, for the ornament of the metropolis and the convenience of commerce. They had obtained an act of parliament, impowering them to build a new bridge over the Thames, from Blackfriars to the oppoſite ſhore, about midway between thoſe of London and Weſtminſter. Commiſſioners were appointed to put this act in execution; and at a court of common-council, it was reſolved that a ſum, not exceeding one hundred and forty-four thouſand pounds, ſhould be forthwith raiſed, within the ſpace of eight years, by inſtalments, not exceeding thirty thouſand pounds in one year, to be paid into the chamber of London: that the perſons advancing the money ſhould have an intereſt at the rate of four pounds per cent. per annum, to be paid half yearly by the chamberlain, yet redeemable at the expiration of the firſt ten years: and that the chamberlain ſhould affix the city's ſeal to ſuch inſtruments as the committee might think fit to give for ſecuring the payment of the ſaid annuities. Such were the firſt effectual ſteps taken towards the execution of a laudable meaſure, which, however violently oppoſed in the ſequel, is now carried on with equal harmony and expedition.

The inhabitants of London were, in the courſe of this year, greatly alarmed by two dreadful fires, which broke out in different parts of the city at no great interval of time. The firſt happened in the month of November, in the neighbourhood of the Royal Exchange, and burned with ſuch fury that, notwithſtanding the aſſiſtance of the firemen and engines, employed under the perſonal direction of the magiſtracy, it deſtroyed a good number of houſes, and damaged many more. That whole quarter of the town was filled with conſternation: ſome individuals were beggared; one or two periſhed in the flames, and ſome were buried in the ruin of the houſes that ſunk under the diſaſter. The other broke out in the month of December, at a cabinet-maker's in King's-ſtreet, Covent Garden, and raged with ſuch violence that it conſumed no leſs than fifty houſes; and the loſs ſuſtained by the unhappy ſufferers amounted to upwards of ſeventy thouſand pounds.

Some ſucceſsful attempts were about this time made towards the diſcovery of the longitude at ſea, that great deſideratum in navigation; for the aſcertainment of which ſo many nations have offered a public recompence, and in the inveſtigation of which ſo many mathematical heads have been diſordered. Some of thoſe who now appeared candidates for the prize deſerved encouragement for the ingenuity of their ſeveral ſyſtems; but he who ſeemed to enjoy the pre-eminence, in the opinion and favour of the public, was Mr. Irwin, a native of Ireland, who contrived a chair ſo artfully poiſed, that a perſon ſitting in it on board a ſhip, even in a rough ſea, can, through a teleſcope, obſerve the immerſion and emerſion of Jupiter's ſatellites, without being interrupted or incommoded by the motion of the veſſel. This gentleman was favoured with the aſſiſtance and protection of commodore lord Howe, in whoſe preſence the experiment was tried in ſeveral ſhips at ſea with ſuch ſucceſs, that his lordſhip granted a certificate ſignifying his approbation; and in conſequence of this Mr. Irwin is ſaid to have obtained a conſiderable reward from the board of admiralty.

The people of England, happy in their ſituation, felt none of the furious ſtorms of war which deſolated the neighbouring countries; but, enriched by a ſurpriſing augmentation of commerce, enjoyed all the ſecurity of peace, and all the pleaſures of taſte and affluence. The univerſity of Oxford having conferred the office of their chancellor, vacant by the death of the earl of Arran, upon another nobleman of equal honour and integrity, namely, the earl of Weſtmoreland, he made a public entrance into that celebrated ſeat of learning with great magnificence, and was inſtalled amidſt the encænia, which were celebrated with ſuch claſſical elegance of pomp as might have rivalled the chief Roman feſtival of the Auguſtan age. The chancellor elect was attended by a ſplendid train of the nobility and perſons of diſtinction. The city of Oxford was filled with a vaſt concourſe of ſtrangers. The proceſſions were contrived with taſte, and conducted with decorum. The inſtallation was performed with the moſt ſtriking ſolemnity. The congratulatory verſes and public ſpeeches breathed the ſpirit of old Rome: and the ceremony was cloſed by Dr. King, that venerable ſage of St. Mary Hall, who pronounced an oration in praiſe of the new chancellor with all the flow of Tully, animated by the fire of Demoſthenes.

In the ſpring of this year the liberal arts received a ſevere blow in the death of George-Frederic Handel, the moſt celebrated maſter in muſic which this age has produced. He was by birth a German; but had ſtudied in Italy, and afterwards ſettled in England, where he met with the moſt favourable reception, and reſided above half a century, univerſally admired for his ſtupendous genius in the ſublime parts of muſical compoſition.

The following event is ſo ſurpriſing and deplorable in all its circumſtances, that it may well claim a place in the hiſtory of England. A ſloop called the Dolphin, bound from the Canaries to New York, met with ſuch unfavourable weather, that ſhe was detained one hundred and ſixty-five days in the paſſage, and the proviſion of the ſhip was altogether expended before the firſt fifty days were elapſed. The wretched crew had devoured their dog, cat, and all the ſhoes on board: at length, being reduced to the laſt extremity, they agreed to caſt lots for their lives, that the body of him upon whom the lot ſhould fall might ſerve for ſome time to ſupport the ſurvivors. The wretched victim was one Antonio Galatia, a Spaniſh gentleman and paſſenger. Him they ſhot with a muſquet; and having cut off his head, threw it overboard; but the intrails and the reſt of the carcaſe they greedily devoured. This horrid banquet having, as it were, fleſhed the famiſhed crew, they began to talk of another ſacrifice; from which, however, they were diverted by the influence and remonſtrances of their captain, Mr. Baron, who prevailed upon them to be ſatisfied with about an inch and a half ſquare of leather to each man per diem, cut from a pair of breeches that were found in the cabin. Upon this calamitous pittance, together with the graſs which grew plentifully upon the deck, theſe poor objects made ſhift to ſubſiſt for twenty days; at the expiration of which they were relieved, and taken on board one captain Bradſhaw, who chanced to fall in with them at ſea. By this time the whole crew, conſiſting of ſeven men, were ſo ſqualid and emaciated, as to exhibit an appearance at once piteous and terrible; and ſo reduced in point of ſtrength, that it was found neceſſary to uſe ropes and tackle for hoiſting them from one ſhip to another.

In the month of November the Britiſh parliament was opened by commiſſion; and the commons attending in the houſe of peers, the lord-keeper made a ſpeech to the members, importing, that his majeſty had directed him to aſſure them, that he thought himſelf peculiarly happy in being able to convoke them in a ſituation of affairs ſo glorious to his crown and advantageous to his kingdoms; that the king ſaw and devoutly adored the hand of Providence in the many ſignal ſucceſſes, both by ſea and land, with which his arms had been bleſſed in the courſe of the laſt campaign: that he reflected with great ſatisfaction on the confidence which the parliament had placed in him, by making ſuch ample proviſions, and intruſting him with ſuch extenſive powers, for carrying on a war which the defence of their valuable rights and poſſeſſions, together with the preſervation of the commerce of his people, had rendered both juſt and neceſſary: that he needed not remind them of the late ſucceſſes of the Britiſh arms, the reduction of Goree on the coaſt of Africa, the conqueſt of ſo many important places in America, the defeat of the French army in Canada, the reduction of their capital city Quebec, effected with ſo much honour to the courage and conduct of his majeſty's officers and forces; the important advantage obtained by the Britiſh ſquadron off Cape Lagos, and the effectual blocking up for ſo many months the principal part of the French navy in their their own harbours; events which muſt have filled the hearts of all his majeſty's faithful ſubjects with the ſincereſt joy, and convinced his parliament that there had been no want of vigilance or vigour on his part, in exerting thoſe means which they with ſo much prudence and public-ſpirited zeal had put into his majeſty's hands: that the national advantages had extended even as far as the Eaſt Indies, where, by the Divine Bleſſing, the dangerous deſigns of his majeſty's enemies had miſcarried, and that valuable branch of commerce had received great benefit and protection: that the memorable victory gained over the French at Minden had long made a deep impreſſion on the minds of his majeſty's people: that if the criſis in which this battle was fought, the ſuperior number of the enemy, the great and able conduct of his majeſty's general, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, were conſidered, that action muſt be the ſubject of laſting admiration and thankfulneſs: that if any thing could fill the breaſts of his majeſty's good ſubjects with ſtill farther degrees of exultation, it would be the diſtinguiſhed and unbroken valour of the Britiſh troops, owned and applauded by thoſe whom they overcame: that the glory they had gained was not merely their own, but, in a national view, was one of the moſt important circumſtances of our ſucceſs, as it muſt be a ſtriking admonition to our enemies with whom they have to contend: that his majeſty's good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia, attacked and ſurrounded by ſo many conſiderable powers, had, by his magnanimity and abilities, and the bravery of his troops, been able, in a ſurpriſing manner, to defeat the ſchemes concerted for his deſtruction by ſo many formidable enemies: that as the king of Great Britain had not entered into this war from views of ambition, ſo he did not wiſh to continue it from motives of reſentment: that the deſire of his majeſty's heart was to ſee a ſtop put to the effuſion of Chriſtian blood: that, whenever ſuch terms of peace could be eſtabliſhed, as ſhould be juſt and honourable for his majeſty and his allies; and by procuring ſuch advantages as, from the ſucceſſes of his majeſty's arms, might in reaſon and equity be expected, ſhould bring along with them full ſecurity for the future, his majeſty would rejoice to ſee the repoſe of Europe reſtored on ſuch ſolid and durable foundations; and his faithful ſubjects, to whoſe liberal ſupport and unſhaken firmneſs his majeſty owed ſo much, happy in the enjoyment of the bleſſings of peace and tranquillity; but, in order to this great and deſirable end, he ſaid his majeſty was confident the parliament would agree with him, that it was neceſſary to make ample proviſion for carrying on the war, in all parts, with the utmoſt vigour: that the great ſupplies which the commons had granted in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, had been faithfully employed for the purpoſes for which they were allotted; but the uncommon extent of the war, and the various ſervices neceſſary to be provided for, in order to ſecure ſucceſs to his majeſty's meaſures, had unavoidably occaſioned extraordinary expences: that his majeſty took the higheſt ſatisfaction in that harmony and good agreement which was ſo conſpicuous among his ſubjects; he was happy in ſeeing it continued and confirmed: and that experience had ſhewn how much the nation owed to this union, which alone could ſecure the true happineſs of his people.

This ſpeech was highly applauded, not only by the parliament, but alſo by the nation in general. As the addreſſes of both houſes were conceived nearly in the ſame ſtrain, I ſhall content myſelf with exhibiting to the reader a complete copy of that of the commons. It was expreſſed in the following terms:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Great Britain, in parliament aſſembled, return your majeſty our moſt humble thanks for the ſpeech delivered, by your majeſty's command, to both houſes of parliament.

"Permit us, Sir, with the ſincereſt zeal and duty, to congratulate your majeſty on the glorious and uninterrupted ſeries of ſucceſs and victory which hath attended your majeſty's arms during the whole courſe of this diſtinguiſhed and memorable year.

"With the deepeſt reverence and moſt devout gratitude to Divine Providence, we acknowlege that manifeſt bleſſing and protection which God hath vouchſafed to beſtow upon your majeſty's counſels and arms, and offer up our moſt ardent vows and prayers for its continuance.

"Your majeſty's faithful commons will not attempt to enumerate all the advantages and glories derived to your majeſty and theſe kingdoms, from the various ſucceſſes which have been extended into every quarter of the world; but we humbly beg leave to aſſure your majeſty, that our hearts are filled with a lively and moſt grateful ſenſe of the happy conſequences which, under God, are owing to the wiſdom, vigilance, and vigour of your majeſty's meaſures in the proſecution of this juſt and neceſſary war; particularly, the taking of the iſland of Goree, and the extenſion of our commerce on the coaſt of Africa: the defeat of the French fleet in the Eaſt Indies, and the repulſe of the land forces before Madraſs, whereby the dangerous deſigns of our enemies there have miſcarried, and protection hath been given to our trade and ſettlement in thoſe countries: the valuable conqueſt of Guadalupe and Marigalante in the Weſt Indies; the reduction of ſo many forts and places in North America, completed and crowned by that glorious and deciſive victory over the French army in Canada, and the ſurrender of their capital city Quebec, effected with ſo much courage and conduct of your majeſty's officers, both by ſea and land, and with ſo much luſtre to your intrepid forces; the important ſucceſs of your majeſty's fleet, in purſuing, taking, and deſtroying a conſiderable part of the French ſquadron off Cape Lagos; and blocking up for ſo many months the reſt of the navy of France, in their own ports, which has greatly augmented the diſtreſs of our enemies, whilſt it has protected and ſecured our commerce and navigation.

"Nor can we forget that critical, ſignal, and memorable defeat of the French army near Minden, ſo juſtly the ſubject of laſting admiration and thankfulneſs, if we conſider the ſuperior numbers of the enemy, the great and able conduct of his ſerene highneſs prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, or the unconquerable valour of your majeſty's troops.

"When

"When we reflect upon this continued train of ſucceſſes, part of which would have been ſufficient to have ſignalized this long and active campaign, it is impoſſible for us not to expreſs the higheſt ſatisfaction at the great ability, reſolution, and perfect harmony, ſo conſpicuous in your majeſty's admirals and generals throughout the execution of your commands; and at the ardent courage which hath manifeſted itſelf in the behaviour of the officers and forces by ſea and land with ſuch perſonal and national glory. Nothing but this ſpirit could have enabled them to ſurmount every difficulty ariſing from the ſuperior number and ſituation of the enemy; and we are perſuaded that the like reſolution, ardour, and zeal, exerted and animated by theſe beſt incentives, your majeſty's gracious acceptance and royal approbation of their eminent ſervices, followed by the warmeſt and moſt univerſal applauſe of their country, will continue to give terror to the enemies, and confidence to the allies of Great Britain.

"We view, with the higheſt admiration, the magnanimity and unexampled efforts of that great prince, your majeſty's ally the king of Pruſſia, whoſe conſummate genius, unwearied activity, and unſhaken conſtancy of mind, ſeconded by the bravery of his troops, have been able, in every ſituation, to ſupply reſources ſufficient to reſiſt the united forces of ſo many and ſuch formidable powers.

"Your majeſty's faithful commons feel, with due gratitude, your patenral care and concern for the peace and happineſs of your people; and cannot too much admire that true greatneſs of mind which diſpoſes your heart, in the midſt of proſperities, to wiſh that a ſtop may be put to the effuſion of Chriſtian blood, and that public tranquility may be reſtored.

"We entirely rely on your majeſty's known wiſdom and firmneſs, that this deſirable object, whenever it ſhall be attained, will be on ſuch terms as ſhall be juſt and honourable for your majeſty and your allies; and ſhall bring along with them full ſecurity for the future, on ſolid and durable foundations, by procuring ſuch advantages as may, in reaſon and equity, be expected from the ſucceſs of our arms, and which will fix, in the minds of a grateful people, the laſting remembrance of this happy æra, and of the benefits derived to them, under your majeſty's gracious and auſpicious government.

"In order to effect this great end, we are thoroughly ſenſible that ample proviſion muſt be made for carrying on the war, in all parts, with the utmoſt vigour; and we aſſure your majeſty that we will chearfully grant your majeſty ſuch ſupplies as ſhall be found neceſſary to ſuſtain, and preſs with effect, all our extenſive operations againſt the enemy, and at the ſame time, by the bleſſing of God, to repel and fruſtrate their daring deſigns againſt theſe kingdoms; convinced, from the long experience we have had of your majeſty's wiſdom aud goodneſs, that they will be applied in ſuch a manner as will beſt anſwer theſe purpoſes.

"We cannot ſufficiently teſtify our grateful ſenſe of the high ſatisfaction which your majeſty has been pleaſed to expreſs, in that perfect union and good harmony which ſo happily ſubſiſts among your faithful ſubjects, the ſalutary effects of which have been moſt conſpicuous; and the pleaſing experience we have had of them, joined to your majeſty's paternal recommendation, muſt be the moſt powerful motives to enforce the continuance of thoſe diſpoſitions, ſo eſſential to the full exertion of our utmoſt ſtrength, as well as to the tranquility, good order, and happineſs of your majeſty's people."

The addreſſes of the two houſes were no ſooner preſented than the commons proceeded to ſettle the ſupply. For the ſervice of the enſuing year they voted ſeventy thouſand ſeamen, including eighteen thouſand three hundred and fifty-five marines; and for their maintenance allotted three millions ſix hundred and forty thouſand pounds. The number of land-forces, including the Britiſh troops in Germany, and the invalids, they fixed at fifty-ſeven thouſand two hundred and ninety-four men, and granted for their ſubſiſtence one million three hundred eighty-three thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-eight pounds ten-pence. For maintaining other forces in the plantations, Gibraltar, Guadalupe, Africa, and the Eaſt Indies, they allowed eight hundred forty-ſix thouſand one hundred and ſixty-eight pounds nineteen ſhillings; for the expence of four regiments on the Iriſh eſtabliſhment, ſerving in North America, they voted thirty-five thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-four pounds eight ſhillings and four-pence. For pay to the general and ſtaff-officers, and officers of the hoſpital for the land forces, they aſſigned fifty-four thouſand four hundred and fifty-four pounds eleven ſhillings and nine-pence. They voted for the expence of the militia in South and North Britain, the ſum of one hundred two thouſand and ſix pounds four ſhillings and eight-pence. They granted for the maintenance of thirty-eight thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty men, being the troops of Hanover, Wolfenbuttle, Saxe-Gotha, and Buckeburg, retained in the ſervice of Great Britain, the ſum of four hundred forty-ſeven thouſand eight hundred eighty-two pounds ten ſhillings and five-pence halfpenny; and for nineteen thouſand Heſſian troops, in the ſame pay, they gave three hundred ſixty-ſix thouſand ſeven hundred twenty-five pounds one ſhilling and ſix-pence. They afterwards beſtowed the ſum of one hundred eight thouſand and twelve pounds twelve ſhillings and ſeven-pence, for defraying the additional expence of augmentations in the troops of Hanover and Heſſe, and the Britiſh army ſerving in the empire. For the ordinary of the navy, including half pay to ſea officers; for carrying on the building of two hoſpitals, one near Goſport, and the other in the neighbourhood of Plymouth; for the ſupport of the hoſpital at Greenwich; for purchaſing ground, erecting wharfs, and other accommodations neceſſary for refitting the fleets at Halifax in Nova Scotia; for the charge of the office of ordnance, and defraying the extraordinary expence incurred by that office in the courſe of the laſt year, they allowed ſeven hundred eighty-one thouſand four hundred and eighty-nine pounds ſix ſhillings and ſix-pence. Towards paying off the navy debt, buildings, rebuildings, and repairs of the king's ſhips, together with the charge of tranſport-ſervice, they granted one million ſeven hundred and one thouſand ſeventy-eight pounds ſixteen ſhillings and ſix-pence. For defraying the extraordinary expences of the land forces, and other ſervices not provided for by parliament, comprehending the penſions for the widows of reduced officers, they allotted the ſum of nine hundred fifty-five thouſand three hundred and forty-four pounds fifteen ſhillings and five-pence halfpenny. They voted one million to empower his majeſty to diſcharge the like ſum, raiſed in purſuance of an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, and charged upon the firſt aids or ſupplies to be granted in this ſeſſion of parliament. They gave ſix hundred and ſeventy thouſahd pounds for enabling his majeſty to make good his engagements with the king of Pruſſia, purſuant to a new convention between him and that monarch, concluded on the ninth day of November in the preſent year. Fifteen thouſand pounds they allowed, upon account, towards enabling the principal officers of his majeſty's ordnance to defray the neceſſary charges and expences of taking down and removing the preſent magazine for gun-powder, ſituated in the neighbourhood of Greenwich, and of erecting it in ſome leſs dangerous ſituation. Sixty thouſand pounds they gave to enable his majeſty to fulfil his engagements with the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, purſuant to the ſeparate article of a treaty between the two powers, renewed in the month of November; the ſum to be paid as his moſt Serene Highneſs ſhould think it moſt convenient, in order to facilitate the means by which the landgrave might again fix his reſidence in his own dominions, and by his preſence give freſh courage to his faithful ſubjects. Five hundred thouſand pounds they voted, upon account, as a preſent ſupply towards defraying the charges of forage, bread, bread waggons, train of artillery, wood, ſtraw, proviſions, and contingencies of his majeſty's combined army under the command of prince Ferdinand. To the Foundling hoſpital they granted five thouſand pounds; and fifteen thouſand for improving, widening, and enlarging the paſſage over and through London-bridge. To replace divers ſums taken from the ſinking fund, they granted two hundred twenty-five thouſand two hundred and eighty-one pounds nineteen ſhillings and four-pence. For the ſubſiſtence of reduced officers, including the allowances to the ſeveral officers and private men of the two troops of horſe-guards and regiment of horſe reduced, and to the ſuperannuated gentlemen of the four troops of horſe-guards, they voted thirty-eight thouſand five hundred and ninety-ſeven pounds nine ſhillings. Upon account, for the ſupport of the colonies of Nova Scotia and Georgia, they granted twenty-one thouſand ſix hundred twenty-four pounds two ſhillings and two-pence. For enabling the king to give a proper compenſation to the provinces in North America, for the expences they might incur in levying and maintaining troops, according as the vigour and activity of thoſe reſpective provinces ſhould be thought by his majeſty to merit, they advanced the ſum of two hundred thouſand pounds. The Eaſt India company they gratified with twenty thouſand pounds towards enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in their ſettlements, in lieu of a battalion of the king's troops now returned to Ireland. Twenty five thouſand pounds were provided for the payment of the out-penſioners of Chelſea-hoſpital. For ſubſequent augmentations of the Britiſh forces, ſince the firſt eſtimate of guards and garriſons for the enſuing year was preſented, they allowed one hundred thirty-four thouſand one hundred thirty-nine pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and four-pence. They further voted, upon account, towards enabling the governors and guardians of the Foundling-hoſpital to maintain, educate, and bind apprentice, the children admitted into the ſaid charity, the ſum of forty-ſeven thouſand two hundred and eighty-five pounds. For defraying the expence of maintaining the militia in South and North Britain, to the twenty-fourth day of December of the enſuing year, they voted an additional grant of two hundred ninety thouſand eight hundred and twenty-ſix pounds ſixteen ſhillings and eight-pence: and, moreover, they granted fourſcore thouſand pounds, upon account, towards defraying the charge of pay and cloathing of the unembodied militia for the year, ending on the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-one. For reimburſing the colony of New-York their expences in furniſhing proviſions and ſtores to the troops raiſed by them for his majeſty's ſervice, in the campaign of the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-ſix, they allowed two thouſand nine hundred and ſeventy-ſeven pounds ſeven ſhillings and eight-pence: and for maintaining the Britiſh forts and ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa, they renewed the grant of ten thouſand pounds. For the maintenance and augmentation of the troops of Brunſwic, in the pay of Great Britain, for the enſuing year, purſuant to an ulterior convention concluded and ſigned at Paderborn on the fifth day of March, in the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty, they granted the ſum of ninety thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-nine pounds eight ſhillings and eleven-pence farthing: and for the troops of Heſſe Caſſel in the ſame pay, during the ſame period, they allotted one hundred and one thouſand ninety-ſix pounds three ſhillings and two pence. For the extraordinary expences of the land forces, and other ſervices incurred, from the twenty-fourth day of December following, and not provided for, they granted the ſum of four hundred and twenty thouſand one hundred and twenty pounds one ſhilling. To make good the deficiency of the grants for the ſervice of this preſent year one thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty-nine, they aſſigned the ſum of ſeventy-five thouſand one hundred and ſeventy pounds three-pence farthing. For printing the Journals of the Houſe of Commons they gave five thouſand pounds; and ſix hundred thirty-four pounds thirteen ſhillings and ſeven-pence as intereſt, at the rate of four per cent. per annum, from the twenty-fifth day of Auguſt in the preſent year to the ſame day of April next, for the ſum of twenty-three thouſand eight hundred pounds eleven ſhillings and eleven-pence remaining in the office of ordnance, and not paid into the hands of the deputy of the king's remembrancer of the cour of Exchequer, as directed by an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, to make compenſation for lands and hereditaments purchaſed for his majeſty's ſervice at Chatham, Portſmouth, and Plymouth, by reaſon of doubts and difficulties which had ariſen touching the execution of the ſaid act. For defraying the extraordinary charge of the mint, during the preſent year, they allowed eleven thouſand nine hundred and

and forty pounds thirteen ſhillings and ten-pence; and two thouſand five hundred pounds, upon account, for paying the debts claimed and ſuſtained upon a forfeited eſtate in North Britain. They likewiſe allowed twelve thouſand eight hundred and ſeventy-four pounds fifteen ſhillings and ten-pence, for defraying the charge of a regiment of light dragoons, and of an additional company to the corps commanded by lieutenant-colonel Vaughan. Finally, they voted one million, upon account, to enable the king to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred or to be incurred for the ſervice of the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty; and to take all ſuch meaſures as might be neceſſary to defeat any enterprize or deſigns of his enemies, as the exigency of affairs might require.

In a word, the ſum total granted in this ſeſſion of parliament amounted to fifteen millions five hundred three thouſand five hundred and ſixty-three pounds fifteen ſhillings and nine-pence halfpenny; a ſum which, however immenſe, and even ſeemingly enormous, was no more than was abſolutely neceſſary for carrying on the war with that ſpirit and vigour with which it had hitherto been proſecuted.

The funds eſtabliſhed for raiſing this ſum conſiſted of the following particulars. The land-tax at four ſhillings in the pound, and the malt-tax, were continued, as the ſtanding revenue of Great Britain. The committee reſolved that the ſum of eight millions ſhould be raiſed by transferable annuities, after the rate of four pounds per centum: that an additional capital of three pounds ſhould be added to every hundred pounds advanced, to conſiſt of a lottery ticket valued at ten pounds, to be attended alſo with transferable annuities, after the rate of four per cent. per annum, to commence from the fifth day of January, in the year 1761, to continue for twenty years, and then be reduced to three pounds per cent. per annum: and that the ſaid ſum of eight millions ſhould bear the ſame intereſt of four per cent. commencing on the ſame day, to continue for twenty-one years, and then be reduced to three pounds per centum: that the ſaid annuities ſhould be transferable at the bank of England, and be redeemable by parliament, in the whole or in part, by ſums not leſs than five hundred thouſand pounds at one time, after the expiration of twenty-one years, and not ſooner, ſix months notice having been given of ſuch payments reſpectively: that every ſubſcriber ſhould, on or before the fifteenth day of January next, make a depoſit of fifteen pounds per cent. on ſuch ſums as he ſhould chuſe to ſubſcribe towards raiſing the eight millions, with the caſhiers of the bank of England, as a ſecurity for his making the future payments, which were fixed in the following manner; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-ſixth day of February next; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-fifth day of March next; ten per cent. on or before the twenty-ninth day of April next; the ſame proportion on the laſt day of May, the third day of July, the fourteenth day of Auguſt, the ſixteenth day of September, and the twenty-ninth day of October; which ſeveral ſums ſo received ſhould, by the ſaid caſhiers, be paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, to be applied, from time to time, to ſuch ſervices as ſhould then have been voted by the houſes in this ſeſſion of parliament, and not otherwiſe: that ſuch of the proprietors of tallies and orders made out at the Exchequer, by virtue of an act paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, for enabling the king to raiſe the ſum of one million, for the uſes and purpoſes therein mentioned, as ſhould be deſirous of ſubſcribing a ſum equal to the principal ſum contained in ſuch reſpective orders; and ſhould, on or before the eighth day of January, produce the ſaid orders, and ſignify ſuch their deſire to the ſaid caſhiers, ſhould be admitted ſubſcribers for ſuch ſums: that any tallies or orders made out at the Exchequer, by virtue of the ſaid act, ſhould be received by the ſaid caſhiers as caſh, to the amount of the reſpective ſums contained in ſuch tallies or orders, and the intereſt that ſhould be due thereupon, as well in making the ſaid depoſit, as in all ſubſequent payments: that the tallies and orders ſo received, ſhould be taken at the receipt of the Exchequer, and allowed in the payments to be made by the caſhiers, for the amount of ſuch principal ſums and intereſt: and that every ſubſcriber who ſhould pay in the whole of this ſubſcription, on or before the ſixteenth day of September, ſhould be allowed a diſcount, after the rate of three pounds per cent. per annum, from the day ſuch ſubſcription ſhould be ſo completed, to the twenty-ninth day of October.

The committee further reſolved, that an additional tax of three-pence ſhould be paid for every buſhel of malt made in England and Wales, and three halfpence for every buſhel made in Scotland; and ſo proportionably for any greater or leſs quantity, to be paid by the makers thereof: that three halfpence ſhould be paid for every buſhel of malt conveyed from Scotland to England and Wales: and that the afore-mentioned annuities and lottery ſhould be charged upon the ſaid duties on malt, for which the ſinking fund ſhould be a collateral ſecurity. With regard to the ſame impoſition they reſolved, that this new duty ſhould, both in England and Scotland, be paid for every buſhel of malt, whether ground or unground, which, having been made before the commencement of theſe additional duties, ſhould, on or after the ſaid day of commencement, be in the poſſeſſion of any maltſter, or maker of malt, for ſale, ſeller, or retailer of malt, brewer, diſtiller, inn-keeper, victualler, vinegar-maker, or any perſon or perſons in truſt for them, or for their uſe: that the monies ariſing by the ſaid duties ſhould be carried to, and made part of the fund for the payment of the annuities and lottery, allowing the ſum of eight millions granted to his majeſty in the preſent ſeſſion of parliament.

They determined that a ſtamp duty of ten ſhillings ſhould be charged on every piece of vellum or parchment, or ſheet of paper, on which any licence for making and ſelling meaſures of capacity ſhould be engroſſed, written, or printed, as well as upon every piece of vellum or paper on which a licence, for making and ſelling weights, ſhould be written or printed. They reſolved, that a new duty of five-pence ſhould be charged upon every gallon of low wines or ſpirits, of the firſt extraction, made or drawn from any ſort of liquor or waſh brewed of malt or corn, or from brewers waſh or tilts, over and above all other duties charged or chargeable thereon, to be paid by the diſtillers or makers thereof: that for every gallon of ſtrong waters, or aqua vitæ, made for ſale, of the materials aforeſaid, one ſhilling and three-pence, over and above all other duties charged and chargeable thereon, ſhould be paid by the diſtillers or makers thereof; and that the ſame duty ſhould be exacted of the diſtillers or makers, for every gallon of low wines or ſpirits of the firſt extraction, made or drawn from any foreign or imported materials, or any mixture therewith, over and above all other duties: that a new duty of eight-pence per gallon ſhould be impoſed upon ſpirits drawn in Great Britain from any foreign or imported materials, or any mixture therewith: that ſix-pence three farthings, over and above all other duties chargeable thereon, ſhould be paid for every gallon of low wines, or ſpirits of the firſt extraction, made or drawn from cyder, or any ſort of Britiſh materials, except thoſe before mentioned, or any mixture therewith; and that the diſtillers and makers ſhould pay one ſhilling one penny three farthings for every gallon of ſpirits made for ſale from cyder, or any other Britiſh materials, except thoſe already mentioned, over and above all other duties chargeable in the ſame article: that, in order to encourage the exportation of ſpirits drawn or made in Great Britain, the like drawbacks and allowances ſhould be made, under proper regulations, upon the exportation of rectified ſpirits made or drawn in Great Britain, as are now payable upon the exportation of home-made raw ſpirits; and that, as a further encouragement, an additional drawback or allowance of twenty-four pounds ten ſhillings per ton ſhould be paid, upon the exportation of all ſuch ſpirits: that an additional duty of one ſhilling for every gallon of ſingle brandy, ſpirits, or aqua vitæ, imported from beyond ſeas; and of two ſhillings for every gallon of ſuch ſpirits above proof, commonly called double brandy, ſo imported, ſhould be paid by the importer; and that theſe additional duties ſhould ſtand appropriated and be applied to the ſame uſes and purpoſes, reſpectively, to which the preſent duties on ſpirituous liquors are now applied and appropriated.

The committee reſolved, that the three pound per cent. annuities, amounting to ſix millions ſix hundred thouſand pounds, together with the additional capital of fifteen pounds added to every hundred pounds advanced towards the ſaid ſum, amounting to nine hundred and ninety thouſand pounds, granted in the laſt ſeſſion, ſhould be, with the conſent of the ſeveral proprietors, made part of the joint ſtock of three pounds per cent. annuities, transferable at the bank of England, conſolidated by the acts in the twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirty-ſecond of his preſent majeſty's reign; and the charges and expences in reſpect thereof, be charged upon and paid out of the ſinking fund, until redemption thereof by parliament, in the ſame and like manner as the annuities conſolidated as aforeſaid are paid and payable; and that ſuch perſons as ſhould not, on or before the twentieth day of June enſuing, ſignify their diſſent, in books to be opened at the bank of England for that purpoſe, ſhould be deemed aſſenting thereto: that all monies ariſing from the fifth day of January next, or that may afterwards ariſe from the produce of the ſubſidy of poundage upon certain goods and merchandizes imported or to be imported into the kingdom; and the additional inland duty on coffee and chocolate, which were made a fund for payment of three pounds per cent. per annum, at the bank of England, on ſix millions ſix hundred thouſand pounds, by virtue of an act towards the ſupply of this year, 1759; as alſo the additional capital of fifteen pounds added to every hundred advanced towards the ſaid ſum, amounting to nine hundred and ninety thouſand pounds, ſhould be made part of the ſinking fund: that all duties charged upon rum or ſpirits of the growth, produce, and manufacture of his majeſty's ſugar plantations, imported into Great Britain, ſhould be drawn back upon the re-exportation; and that an additional drawback or allowance of three pounds three ſhillings per ton ſhould be paid upon the exportation of ſpirits drawn in Great Britain from molaſſes, over and above all other drawbacks and allowances payable thereon.

They reſolved to continue in force ſeveral acts and clauſes relating to the juriſdiction, powers, and authorities veſted in commiſſioners for licenſing hackney chairs and coaches; and agreed, that the act for making ſail-cloth, now near expiring, ſhould be protracted. They reſolved, that for raiſing the ſum of one million, granted to his majeſty towards diſcharging the debt of the navy, and alſo the ſum of five hundred thouſand pounds, ſhould be raiſed by loans, or Exchequer bills, to be charged upon the firſt aids to be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament; and ſuch Exchequer bills, if not diſcharged, with intereſt, on or before the twenty-fifth day of March, in the year 1761, to be exchanged and received in payment, in ſuch manner as Exchequer bills have uſually been exchanged and received: that the ſum of two millions ſix hundred two thouſand ſeven hundred and ſix pounds nine ſhillings and nine-pence, ſhould be iſſued and applied out of ſuch monies as ſhould or might ariſe from the ſurplus, exceſs, or overplus monies, and other revenues compoſing the ſinking fund: and that the ſum of one million ſhould be raiſed by loans, or Exchequer bills, to be charged on the firſt aids to be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament.

The whole proviſion made by the committee of ways and means, amounted to ſixteen millions one hundred thirty thouſand five hundred and ſixty-one pounds nine ſhillings and eight-pence, exceeding the grant for the ſervice of the year one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty, in the ſum of ſix hundred twenty-ſix thouſand nine hundred and ninety-ſeven pounds thirteen ſhillings and ten-pence halfpenny. This exceſs, however, will not appear extraordinary, when we conſider that it was deſtined to make good the premium of two hundred and forty thouſand pounds to the ſubſcribers upon the eight million loan, as well as the deficiencies in the other grants, which never fail to make a conſiderable article in the ſupply of every ſeſſion.

It will not be neceſſary to enumerate all the acts that were founded upon the reſolutions touching the ſupply. It may be proper, however, to obſerve, that in the act for the land-tax, and in the act for the malt-tax, there was a clauſe of credit, impowering the commiſſioners of the Treaſury to raiſe the money, which they produced by loans of Exchequer bills, bearing an intereſt of four per cent. per annum, that is, one per cent. higher than the intereſt uſually granted in time of peace. While the houſe of commons deliberated on the bill for granting to his majeſty ſeveral duties upon malt, and for raiſing a certain ſum of money to be charged on the ſaid duties, a petition was preſented by the maltſters of Ipſwich and parts adjacent, againſt an additional duty on the ſtock of malt in hand: but no regard was paid to this remonſtrance, and the bill, with ſeveral new amendments, paſſed through both houſes, under the title of "An act for granting to his majeſty ſeveral duties upon malt, and for raiſing the ſum of eight millions by way of annuities and a lottery, to be charged on the ſaid duties; and to prevent the fraudulent obtaining of allowances in the gauging of corn making into malt; and for making four duplicates of Exchequer bills, tickets, certificates, receipts, annuity orders, and other orders loſt, burned, or otherwiſe deſtroyed."

The other three bills, that turned wholly on the ſupply, were paſſed in common courſe, without the leaſt oppoſition in either houſe, and received the royal aſſent by commiſſion at the end of the ſeſſion. The firſt of theſe, intitled, A bill for enabling his majeſty to raiſe a certain ſum of money for the uſes and purpoſes therein mentioned, contained a clauſe of appropriation, added to it by inſtruction; and the bank was enabled to lend the million, which the commiſſioners of the Treaſury were empowered by the act to borrow, at the intereſt of four pounds per cent. The ſecond, granting to his majeſty a certain ſum of money out of the ſinking fund for the ſervice of the year 1760, comprehended a clauſe of credit for borrowing the money thereby granted; and another clauſe empowering the bank to lend it without any limitation of intereſt. And the third, enabling his majeſty to raiſe a certain ſum of money towards diſcharging the debt of the navy, and for naval ſervices during the enſuing year, enacted, that the Exchequer bills thereby to be iſſued, ſhould not be received, or paſs to any receiver or collector of the public revenue, or at the receipt of the Exchequer, before the twenty-ſixth day of March in the year 1761.

As the act of the preceding ſeſſion, prohibiting the malt diſtillery, was to expire at Chriſtmas, the commons, thinking it neceſſary to conſider of effectual methods for laying this branch of buſineſs under proper reſtrictions, began as early as the month of November to deliberate on the matter; and after ſome conſideration determined to continue the prohibition of the malt diſtillery till the twenty-fourth day of December in the year 1760, unleſs ſuch continuation ſhould be abridged by any other act to be paſſed in the preſent ſeſſion.

A bill for preventing the exceſſive uſe of ſpirituous liquors, by laying additional duties thereon; for ſhortening the prohibition for making low wines and ſpirits from wheat; for encouraging the exportation of Britiſh made ſpirits, and preventing the fraudulent relanding or importation thereof, alſo acquired the royal ſanction.

They alſo, for a time limited, the act of the laſt ſeſſion, permitting the importation of ſalted beef from Ireland. This permiſſion was accordingly extended to the twenty-fourth day of December, in the year 1761. It were to be wiſhed indeed that a free trade between Great Britain and Ireland could be allowed always to ſubſiſt with equal advantage to both kingdoms, but though this be impoſſible, it ought certainly to be granted, whenever the price of proviſions in England are carried to an immoderate heighth.

As ſeveral lieutenants of counties had, for various reaſons, ſuſpended all proceedings in the execution of the laws relating to the militia for limited times; which ſuſpenſions were deemed inconſiſtent with the intent of the legiſlature, a bill was now brought in to enable his majeſty's lieutenants of the ſeveral counties of England and Wales to proceed in the execution of the militia laws, notwithſtanding any adjournments.

It was enacted, that as the ſpeedy execution of the laws for regulating the militia was moſt eſſentially neceſſary at this juncture to the peace and ſecurity of the kingdom, every lieutenant of the place where ſuch ſuſpenſion had happened, ſhould within one month after the paſſing of this act, proceed as if there had been no ſuch ſuſpenſion, and ſummon a meeting for the ſame purpoſe once in every ſucceeding month, until a ſufficient number of officers, qualified and willing to ſerve, ſhould be found, or until the expiration of the act for the better ordering of the militia forces.

The inſtitution of the militia, though certainly laudable and neceſſary, was attended with ſo many unforeſeen difficulties, that every ſeſſion of parliament, ſince it was firſt eſtabliſhed, has produced new acts for its better regulation. In April leave was given to prepare a bill for limiting, confining, and better regulating the payment of the weekly allowances made by act of parliament, for the maintenance of families unable to ſupport themſelves during the abſence of militia men embodied and ordered into actual ſervice; as well as for amending and improving the eſtabliſhment of the militia, and leſſening the number of officers entitled to pay, within that part of Great Britain called England.

While this bill was under conſideration, the houſe received a petition from the mayor, aldermen, town-clerk, ſheriffs, gentlemen, merchants, clergy, tradeſmen, and others, inhabitants of the ancient city of Lincoln, importing, That by an act paſſed relating to the militia, it was provided, that when any militia men ſhould be ordered out into actual ſervice, leaving families unable to ſupport themſelves during their abſence, the overſeers of the pariſh where ſuch families reſide ſhould allow them ſuch weekly ſupport as ſhould be preſcribed by any one juſtice of the peace; which allowance ſhould be reimburſed out of the county ſtock. They repreſented, that a conſiderable number of men, inhabitants of the ſaid city, had entered themſelves to ſerve in the militia of the county of Lincoln, as volunteers, for ſeveral pariſhes and perſons; yet their families were, nevertheleſs, ſupported by the county ſtock of the city of Lincoln. They took notice of the bill under deliberation, and prayed, that if it ſhould paſs into a law, they might have ſuch relief in the premiſes, as to the houſe ſhould ſeem proper. Regard was had to this petition in the amendments to the bill, which paſſed through both houſes, and received the royal aſſent by commiſſion.

By this law it was enacted, that if any militia man, who ſhall have been accepted and enrolled as a ſubſtitute, hired man, or volunteer, before the paſſing of the act, or who ſhall have been choſen by lot, whether before or after the paſſing of the act, ſhall, when embodied, or called out into actual ſervice, and ordered to march, leave a family unable to ſupport themſelves, the overſeers ſhall, by order of ſome one juſtice of the peace, pay, out of the poor's rates of ſuch pariſh, a weekly allowance to ſuch family, according to the uſual and ordinary price of labour and huſbandry there, viz. for one child under the age of ten years, the price of one day's labour; for two children under the age aforeſaid, the price of two days labour; for three or four children under the age aforeſaid, the price of three days labour; for five or more children under the age aforeſaid, the price of four days labour; and for the wife of ſuch militia man, the price of one day's labour; but that the families of ſuch men only as ſhall be choſen by lot, and of the ſubſtitutes, hired men, and volunteers, already accepted and enrolled, ſhall, after the paſſing of this act, receive any ſuch weekly allowance. For removing the grievance complained of in the above petition, it is enacted, that where treaſurers ſhall reimburſe to overſeers any money, in purſuance of this act, on account of the weekly allowance to the family of any militia man, ſerving in the militia of any county or place, other than that wherein ſuch family ſhall dwell, they are to tranſmit an account thereof, ſigned by ſome juſtice, for the place where ſuch family ſhall dwell, to the treaſurer of the county, &c. in the militia whereof ſuch militia man ſhall ſerve, who is thereupon to pay him the ſums ſo reimburſed to ſuch overſeers, and the ſame to be allowed in his accounts.

During the dependence of this bill, another was brought in to explain ſo much of the militia act paſſed in the thirty-firſt year of his majeſty's reign, as related to the money to be given to private militia men, upon their being ordered out into actual ſervice. By this law it was enacted, that the guinea which, by the former act was due to every private man of every regiment or company of militia, when ordered out into actual ſervice, ſhould be paid to every man that ſhall afterwards be inrolled into ſuch regiment or company whilſt in actual ſervice: that no man ſhould be intitled to his cloaths for his own uſe, until he ſhould have ſerved three years, if unembodied, or one year if embodied, after the delivery of the cloaths: and that the full pay of the militia ſhould commence from the date of his majeſty's warrant for drawing them out.

The next law I ſhall mention was intended to be one of the moſt important that ever fell under the cognizance of the legiſlature: it was a law that affected the freedom, dignity, and independency of parliaments. By an act paſſed in the ninth year of the reign of queen Anne, it was provided, that no perſon ſhould be choſen a member of parliament who did not poſſeſs, in England or Wales, an eſtate, freehold or copyhold, for life, according to the following qualifications: for every knight of a ſhire, ſix hundred pounds per annum, over and above what will ſatisfy all incumbrances; and three hundred pounds per annum for every citizen, burgeſs, and baron of the cinque-port. It was alſo decreed, that the return of any perſon not thus qualified ſhould be void; and that every candidate ſhould, at the reaſonable requeſt of any other candidate at the time of election, or by two or more perſons who had a right to vote, take an oath preſcribed to eſtabliſh his qualifications. This reſtraint was by no means effectual. So many oaths of different kinds had of late been preſcribed, that they began to loſe their due influence on the minds of men; and in particular, political perjury grew ſo common, that it was no longer conſidered as a crime. Subterfuges were diſcovered, by means of which this law relating to the qualification of candidates was effectually eluded. Thoſe who were not actually poſſeſſed of ſuch eſtates procured temporary conveyances from their friends and patrons, on condition of their being reſtored and cancelled after the election. By this ſcandalous fraud, the intention of the legiſlature was fruſtrated; the dignity of parliament proſtituted; the example of perjury and corruption extended; the morals of the people depraved; and the conſtitution expoſed to the moſt imminent danger.

In order to remedy theſe alarming evils, a few gentlemen, warmed with the real love of their country, preſented a bill to the houſe, importing, that every perſon who ſhall be elected a member of the houſe of commons, ſhould, before he preſumed to take his ſeat, deliver to the clerk of the houſe at the table, while the commons are ſitting, and the ſpeaker in the chair, a paper or ſchedule ſigned by himſelf, containing a rental or particular of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, whereby he makes out his qualification, ſpecifying the nature of his eſtate, whether meſſuage, land, rent, tythe, or what elſe; and if ſuch eſtate conſiſts of meſſuages, lands, or tythes, then ſpecifying in whoſe occupation they are; and if in rent, then ſpecifying the names of the owners or poſſeſſors of the lands and tenements out of which ſuch rent is iſſuing; and alſo ſpecifying the pariſh, townſhip, or precinct and county, in which the ſaid eſtate lies, and the value thereof; and every ſuch perſon ſhall, at the ſame time alſo, take and ſubſcribe the following oath, to be fairly written at the bottom of the paper or ſchedule: I, A. B. do ſwear, that the above is a true rental; and that I truly, and bona fide, have ſuch an eſtate in law or equity, to and for my own uſe and benefit, of and in the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, above deſcribed, over and above what will ſatisfy and clear all incumbrances that may affect the ſame; and that ſuch eſtate hath not been granted or made over to me fraudulently, on purpoſe to qualify me to be a member of this houſe. So help me God.

It was provided that the ſaid paper or ſchedule, with the oath aforeſaid, ſhould be carefully kept by the clerk, to be inſpected by the members of the houſe of commons, without fee or reward: that if any perſon elected to ſerve in any future parliament, ſhould preſume to ſit or vote as a member of the houſe of commons, before he has delivered in ſuch a paper or ſchedule, and taken the oath aforeſaid, or ſhould not be qualified according to the true intent or meaning of this act, his election ſhould be void; and every perſon ſo ſitting and voting ſhould forfeit a certain ſum, to be recovered by ſuch perſon as ſhould ſue for the ſame by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information, whereon no eſſoign, privilege, protection, or wager of law, ſhould be allowed, and only one imparlance: that if any perſon ſhould have delivered in, and ſworn to his qualification as aforeſaid, and taken his ſeat in the houſe of commons; yet at any time after ſhould, during the continuance of ſuch parliament, ſell, diſpoſe of, alien, or any other ways encumber the eſtate, or any part thereof comprized in the ſchedule, ſo as to leſſen or reduce the ſame under the value of the qualification by law directed; every ſuch perſon, under a certain penalty, muſt deliver in a new or further qualification, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, and ſwear to the ſame, in manner before directed, before he ſhall again preſume to ſit or vote as a member of the houſe of commons: that in caſe any action, ſuit, or information, ſhall be brought, in purſuance of this act, againſt any member of the houſe of commons, the clerk of the houſe ſhall, upon demand, forthwith deliver a true and atteſted copy of the paper or ſchedule ſo delivered in to him as aforeſaid by ſuch member, to the plaintiff or proſecutor, or his attorney or agent, paying a certain ſum for the ſame; which being proved a true copy, ſhall be admitted to be given in evidence upon the trial of any iſſue, in any ſuch action. Provided always, that nothing contained in this act ſhall extend to the eldeſt ſon or heir-apparent of any peer or lord of parliament, or of any perſon qualified to ſerve as knight of the ſhire, or to the members for either of the univerſities, in that part of Great Britain called England, or to the members for that part of Great Britain called Scotland.

Such was the ſubſtance of the bill, as originally preſented to the houſe of commons; but it was altered and amended in ſuch a manner as will perhaps render it in a great meaſure ineffectual. It ran thus:

Clauſe 1. "Whereas by an act paſſed in the ninth year of the reign of her late majeſty queen Anne, intitled, "An act for ſecuring the freedom of parliaments, by the further qualifying the members to ſit in the houſe of commons," it was enacted, That no perſon ſhould be capable to ſit or vote as a member of the houſe of commons, for any county, city, borough, or cinque-port, within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, who ſhould not have an eſtate, freehold or copyhold, for his own life, or for ſome greater eſtate, either in law or equity, to and for his own uſe and benefit, of or in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, over and above what will clear all incumbrances that might affect the ſame, lying or being within that part of Great Britain called England, the dominion of Wales, and town of Berwick upon Tweed, of the reſpective annual value therein limited, viz. the annual value of ſix hundred pounds above reprizes for every knight of a ſhire, and the annual value of three hundred pounds above reprizes for every citizen, burgeſs, or baron of the cinque-ports.

2. "Now, in order to enforce and render the ſaid act more effectual, be it enacted, by the king's moſt excellent majeſty, by and with the advice and conſent of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, and by the authority of the ſame, That, from and after the determination of this preſent parliament, every perſon, except as is herein after excepted, who ſhall be elected a member of the houſe of commons, ſhall, before he preſumes to vote in the houſe of commons, or ſit there during any debate in the ſaid houſe of commons, after their ſpeaker is choſen, produce and deliver in to the clerk of the ſaid houſe, at the table in the middle of the ſaid houſe, and whilſt the houſe of commons is there duly ſitting, with their ſpeaker in the chair of the ſaid houſe, a paper or account, ſigned by every ſuch member, containing the name or names of the pariſh, townſhip, or precinct, or of the ſeveral pariſhes, townſhips, or precincts, and alſo of the county, or of the ſeveral counties in which the lands, tenements, or hereditaments do lie, whereby he makes out his qualification, declaring the ſame to be of the annual value of ſix hundred pounds above reprizes, if a knight of a ſhire; and of the annual value of three hundred pounds above reprizes, if a citizen, burgeſs, or baron of the cinque-ports; and ſhall alſo at the ſame time take and ſubſcribe the following oath, viz.

"I A. B. do ſwear, that I truly and bona fide have ſuch an eſtate, in law or equity, and of ſuch value, to and for my own uſe and benefit, of or in the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, over and above what will ſatisfy and clear all incumbrances that may affect the ſame, as doth qualify me to be elected and returned to ſerve as a member for the place I am returned for, according to the tenor and good meaning of the acts of parliament in that behalf; and that ſuch lands, tenements, or hereditaments do lie, as deſcribed in the paper or account ſigned by me, and now delivered to the clerk of the houſe of commons. So help me God.

"And the ſaid houſe of commons is hereby impowered and required to adminiſter the ſaid oath and ſubſcription according to the directions of this act, as occaſion ſhall be, from time to time, to every perſon duly demanding the ſame, immediately after ſuch perſon ſhall have taken the oaths of allegiance, ſupremacy, and abjuration, at the ſaid table; and the ſaid oaths and ſubſcription, herein before directed to be taken and made, ſhall be entered into a parchment roll, to be provided for that purpoſe by the clerk of the houſe of commons; and the ſaid papers or accounts ſo ſigned and delivered in to the ſaid clerk as aforeſaid, ſhall be filed and carefully kept by him.

3. "And be it further enacted, by the authority aforeſaid, That if any perſon who ſhall be elected to ſerve in any future parliament, as knight of a ſhire, or as a citizen, burgeſs, or baron of the cinque-port, ſhall preſume to ſit or vote, as aforeſaid, as a member of the houſe of commons, before he has delivered in ſuch paper or account, and taken and ſubſcribed ſuch oath, as aforeſaid; or ſhall not be qualified according to the true intent and meaning of the ſaid recited act, and of this act, his election ſhall be, and is hereby declared to be, void, and a new writ ſhall be iſſued to elect another member in the ſaid perſon's room.

4. "Provided always, that nothing in this act contained ſhall extend to the eldeſt ſon or heir-apparent of any peer or lord of parliament, or of any perſon qualified to ſerve as knight of a ſhire, or to the members for either of the univerſities, in that part of Great Britain called England, or to the members of that part of Great Britain called Scotland."

The houſe having examined an account of the produce of the fund eſtabliſhed for paying annuities granted in the year 1759, with the charge on that fund, on the fifth day of January in the ſucceeding year, it appeared that there had been a conſiderable deficiency in the ſaid fund on the fifth day of July preceding; and this had been made good out of the ſinking fund, by a reſolution of the ſeventh of February, which we have already ſpecified. They therefore inſtructed the committee of ways and means, to conſider ſo much of the annuity and lottery act paſſed in the preceding ſeſſion as related to the three per cent. annuities, amounting to the ſum of ſeven millions five hundred and ninety thouſand pounds, granted in the year 1759; and alſo to conſider ſo much of the ſaid act as related to the ſubſidy of poundage upon certain goods and merchandizes to be imported into this kingdom, and the additional inland duty on coffee and chocolate.

The committee having taken theſe points into deliberation, agreed to the two reſolutions we have already mentioned, with reſpect to the conſolidation; and a bill was brought in for adding thoſe annuities granted in the year 1759, to the joint ſtock of three per cent. annuities, conſolidated by the acts of the twenty-fifth, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, and thirty-ſecond year of his majeſty's reign; and for ſeveral duties therein mentioned, to the ſinking fund. The committee was afterwards empowered to inſert a clauſe for cancelling ſuch lottery tickets as were made forth in an act paſſed in the thirtieth year of his majeſty's reign, and were not then diſpoſed of; a clauſe for this purpoſe was accordingly added to the bill, which paſſed through both houſes without oppoſition, and received the royal aſſent at the end of the ſeſſion.

Towards the end of April admiral Townſhend preſented a bill for the more effectual ſecuring the payment of ſuch prize and bounty monies as were appropriated to the uſe of Greenwich hoſpital, by an act paſſed in the twenty-ninth year of his majeſty's reign. As by that law no time was limited, or particular method preſcribed for giving notifications of the day appointed for the payment of the ſhares of the prizes and bounty-money; and as many agents had neglected to ſpecify in the notification given in the London Gazette, for payment of ſhares of prizes condemned in the courts of admiralty in Great Britain, the particular day or time when ſuch payments were to commence, whereby it was rendered difficult, if not impoſſible, to aſcertain the time when the hoſpital at Greenwich became intitled to the unclaimed ſhares; of conſequence could not enjoy the full benefit of the act. The bill now prepared imported, that from and after the firſt day of September, in the preſent year, all notifications of the payment of the ſhares of prizes taken by any of his majeſty's ſhips of war, and condemned in Great Britain, and from and after the firſt day of February, in the year 1761, all notifications of the payment of the ſhares of prizes taken and condemned in any other of his majeſty's dominions in Europe, or in any of the Britiſh plantations in America; and from and after the twenty-fifth day of December, in the year 1761, all notifications of the payment of the ſhares of prizes taken and condemned in any other of his majeſty's dominions, ſhall be reſpectively given and publiſhed in the following manner: If the prize be condemned in any court of admiralty in Great Britain, ſuch notification, under the agent's hand, ſhall be publiſhed in the London Gazette; and if condemned in any court of admiralty, in any other of his majeſty's dominions, ſuch notifications ſhall be publiſhed in like manner in the Gazette, or other news-paper of public authority, of the iſland or place where the prize is condemned; and if there ſhall be no Gazette or ſuch news-paper publiſhed there, then in ſome one of the public news-papers of the place; and ſuch agents ſhall deliver to the collector, cuſtomer, or ſearcher, or his lawful deputy; and if there ſhall be no ſuch office, then to the principal officer or officers of the place where the prize is condemned, or to the lawful deputy of ſuch principal officer, two of the Gazettes or other news-papers in which ſuch notifications are inſerted; and if there ſhall not be any public news-papers in any ſuch iſland or place, the agent ſhall give two ſuch notifications in writing, under his hand; and every ſuch collector or other officer as aforeſaid, ſhall ſubſcribe his name on both the ſaid Gazettes, news-papers, or written notifications, and by the firſt ſhip which ſhall ſail from thence to any port of Great Britain, ſhall tranſmit to the treaſurer or deputy treaſurers of the ſaid royal hoſpital, one of the ſaid notifications with his name ſo ſubſcribed, to be there regiſtered, and ſhall faithfully preſerve and keep the other, with his name thereon ſubſcribed, in his own cuſtody; and in every notification as aforeſaid, the agent ſhall ſpecify his place of abode, and the preciſe day of the month and year appointed for the payment of the reſpective ſhares to the captors; and all notifications with reſpect to prizes condemned in Great Britain ſhall be publiſhed in the London Gazette, three days at leaſt before any ſhare of ſuce prizes ſhall be paid; and with reſpect to prizes condemned in any other part of his majeſty's dominions, ſuch notification ſhall be delivered to the ſaid collector or other officers aforeſaid, three days at leaſt before any ſhare of ſuch prizes ſhall be paid. It was likewiſe enacted, that the agents of the diſtribution of bounty bills ſhould inſert, and publiſh under their hands, in the London Gazette, three days at leaſt before payment, public notifications of the day and year appointed for ſuch payment, and alſo inſert therein their reſpective places of abode.

A committee having been appointed to enquire into the original ſtandards of weights and meaſures in the kingdom of England, to conſider the laws relating thereto, and to report their obſervations thereupon, together with their opinion of the moſt effectual means for aſcertaining and enforcing uniform and certain ſtandards of weights and meaſures, the prepared copies, models, patterns, and multiples, and preſented them to the houſe: then they were locked up by the clerk of the houſe; and the lord Caryſfort preſented a bill, according to order, for enforcing uniformity of weights and meaſures to the ſtandards by law to be eſtabliſhed: but this meaſure, which had been ſo long in dependence,

Theſe and a good number of other bills of leſs importance, both private and public, were paſſed into laws by commiſſion, on the twenty-ſecond day of May, when the lord-keeper of the great ſeal cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes. He declared in his majeſty's name, that the king looked back on their proceedings with entire ſatisfaction: that the duty and affection which they had expreſſed for the king's perſon and government, the zeal and unanimity they had ſhewed in maintaining the true intereſt of their country, could only be equalled by what his majeſty had formerly experienced from this parliament: that it would have given his majeſty the moſt ſenſible pleaſure, had he been able to aſſure them that his endeavours to promote a general peace, had met with more ſuitable returns: that his majeſty, in conjunction with his good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia, had choſen to give their enemies proof of this equitable diſpoſition, in the midſt of a ſeries of glorious victories; an opportunity the moſt proper to take ſuch a ſtep with dignity, and to manifeſt to all Europe the purity and moderation of his views: that after ſuch a conduct, the king had the comfort to reflect, that the further continuance of the calamities of war could not be imputed to him or his allies: that he truſted in the bleſſing of heaven, upon the juſtice of his arms, and upon thoſe ample means which the zeal of the parliament, in ſo good a cauſe, had wiſely put into his hands, that his future ſucceſſes in carrying on the war would not fall ſhort of the paſt; and that, in the event, the public tranquillity would be reſtored on ſolid and durable foundations: that his majeſty had taken the moſt effectual care to augment the combined army in Germany; and at the ſame time to keep up ſuch a force at home as might fruſtrate any attempts of the enemy to invade theſe kingdoms; ſuch attempts as had hitherto ended only in their own confuſion: that the royal navy was never in a more flouriſhing and reſpectable condition; and the ſignal victory obtained laſt winter over the French fleet, on their own coaſts, had given luſtre to his majeſty's arms, freſh ſpirit to his maritime forces, and reduced the naval ſtrength of France to a very low ebb: that his majeſty had diſpoſed his ſquadrons in ſuch a manner as might beſt conduce to the annoyance of his enemies; to the defence of his own dominions, both in Europe and America; to the preſerving and purſuing his conqueſts, as well as to the protection of the trade of his ſubjects, which he had extremely at heart: that nothing could relieve his majeſty's royal mind, under the anxiety he felt for the burthens of his faithful ſubjects, but the public-ſpirited chearfulneſs with which the commons had granted him ſuch large ſupplies, and his conviction that they were neceſſary for the ſecurity and eſſential intereſts of his kingdoms: he therefore returned them his hearty thanks for theſe ſupplies, and aſſured them they ſhould be duly applied to the purpoſes for which they had been given. Finally, he recommended to both houſes the continuance of that union and good harmony which he had obſerved with ſo much pleaſure, and from which they had derived ſuch important advantages. He deſired they would ſtudy to promote theſe deſirable objects, to ſupport the king's government, and the good order of their reſpective countries, and conſult their own real happineſs and proſperity.

The advances towards an accommodation which had been made in the preceding year by the kings of England and Pruſſia, in their manifeſto publiſhed at the Hague by prince Lewis of Brunſwic, ſeemed to be regarded by neutral powers as a certain proof of their pacific diſpoſition. We have already ſeen that the king of Spain offered his beſt offices in quality of mediator. When a congreſs was propoſed, the States-general made an offer of Breda, as a place proper for the negociation. The king of Great Britain, by the mouth of his ambaſſador, thanked their High Mightineſſes for the ſincere deſire they expreſſed to put an end to the ravages of war, which had extended deſolation over the face of Europe; he readily cloſed with their gracious offer, and, in conſequence of his high regard and invariable friendſhip for their High Mightineſſes, wiſhed earneſtly that it might be acceptable to the other powers at war. The French king returned an anſwer nearly of the ſame import. His ambaſſador declared, That his moſt Chriſtian majeſty was highly ſenſible of the offer they had made of Breda for the holding the congreſs; that, in order to give a freſh proof of his ſincere deſire to encreaſe the good harmony that ſubſiſted between him and the States-general, he accepted their offer with pleaſure: but as he could take no ſtep without the concurrence of his high allies, he was obliged to wait for their anſwer, which could not fail to be favourable, if nothing remained to be ſettled but the place for holding the congreſs.

King Staniſlaus having written a letter to his Britannic majeſty, offering the city of Nancy for the ſame purpoſe, he received a civil anſwer, expreſſing the king of England's ſenſe of his obliging offer, which however he declined, as a place not conveniently ſituated for all the powers intereſted in the great work of pacification. Civilities of the ſame nature likewiſe paſſed between the ſovereign of Lorraine and the king of Pruſſia. As the propoſals for a peace made by the king of England and his allies might have left an unfavourable impreſſion of their adverſaries, had they been flatly rejected, the court of Vienna was prevailed upon to concur with her allies in a declaration, profeſſing their pacific ſentiments; which declaration was delivered on the third day of April, by the Auſtrian miniſter reſiding at the Hague, to his ſerene highneſs prince Lewis of Brunſwic; and a paper of the ſame nature was alſo delivered to him ſeparately by the French and Ruſſian miniſters. Theſe profeſſions, however, did not interrupt the military operations.

Though the French army under the mareſchal duke de Broglio remained in cantonment in the neighbourhood of Friedberg, and prince Ferdinand had retired from Corſdorff to Marpurg, where, in the beginning of January, he fixed his head quarters, yet was not the winter altogether inactive. As far back as the twenty-fifth day of December, the duke de Broglio, having called in his detachments, attempted to ſurpriſe the allied army by a forced march to Klein-linnes; but finding that his ſcheme had been previouſly diſcovered, nothing but a cannonade enſued, and he retreated to his former quarters. On the twenty-ninth colonel Luckner, at the head of the Hanoverian hunters, fell in with a detachment of the enemy, conſiſting of four hundred men, under the command of count Muret. Theſe he attacked with ſuch fury, that the count was made priſoner, and all his party either killed or taken, except two and twenty who eſcaped. On the third day of January the marquis de Vogue attacked the town of Herborn, which he carried, and took a ſmall detachment of the allies who were there poſted. At the ſame time the marquis Dauvet ſurprized the town of Dillemburg, the garriſon of the allied troops being obliged to retire into the caſtle, where they were cloſely beſieged. Prince Ferdinand was no ſooner informed of their ſituation than he began his march with a ſtrong detachment for their relief, on the ſeventh day of the month, when he attacked and totally defeated the beſiegers, took ſeven hundred priſoners, including forty officers, with ſeven pair of colours and two pieces of cannon.

On that very day the Highlanders, under major Keith, ſupported by the huſſars of Luckner, who commanded the whole detachment, attacked the village of Eybach, where Beaufremont's regiment of dragoons was poſted on the ſide of Dillemburg, and routed them with great ſlaughter. The greater part of the regiment was killed, and many priſoners were taken, together with two hundred horſes, and all their baggage. The Highlanders diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion by their intrepidity, which was the more remarkable, as they were no other than raw recruits juſt arrived from their own country, and altogether unacquainted with diſcipline. On the eighth day of January Mr. de St. Germain advanced on the left of the allies, with the grenadiers of the French army, ſuſtained by eight battalions and a body of dragoons: but he was oppoſed by the duke of Holſtein, at the head of a ſtrong detachment in the neighbourhood of Erſdorff, who, by dint of a furious cannonade, compelled him to retreat with precipitation

After this attempt the French parties were recalled, and their army retired into winter quarters in and about Franckfort on the Maine; while prince Ferdinand quartered the allies at Caſſel, Paderborn, Munſter, and Oſnabrug, this laſt place being allotted to the Britiſh troops, as being the neareſt to Embden, where the reinforcements from Britain were to be landed. In the beginning of February the hereditary prince of Brunſwic, with the detachment of the allied army under his command, began his march from Chemnitz in Saxony for Weſtphalia, where he ſafely arrived, after having aſſiſted at a long conference in Hamelen, with his father the reigning duke, his uncle prince Ferdinand, and ſome principal members of the regency of Hanover.

The French general continued to detach ſtrong parties to beat up the quarters of the allies, and lay their towns under contribution. In the beginning of March the marquis de Blaiſel advanced at the head of two thouſand four hundred men from Gieſſen, where he commanded, to Marpurg, forced the gates of the town, and conſtrained the garriſon of the allies to take ſhelter in the caſtle. As he could not pretend to undertake the ſiege of the fortreſs, by the fire of which he was exceedingly galled, he demanded of the town a contribution of one hundred thouſand florins, and carried ſome of the magiſtrates along with him as hoſtages for the payment of this impoſition. He afterwards appeared at Hombourg, Alsfeldt, and Hartzberg, the frontier poſts of the allies; but did not think proper to attack either, becauſe he perceived he would meet with an obſtinate reſiſtance.

The French have long laid claim to the character of the moſt polite and civilized nation in Europe; notwithſtanding which, they are ſometimes found as brutal and rapacious as the moſt barbarous enemy. On pretence of taking umbrage at the town of Hanau Muntzenberg, for having, without their permiſſion, acknowleged the regency of the landgraviate of Heſſe Caſſel, they, in the month of February, ordered the magiſtrates of that place to pay, within the term of twenty-four hours, the ſum of ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand livres, on pain of being ſubjected to military execution. This order was ſignified by the prince de Robecq, to whom the magiſtrates repreſented the impoſſibility of raiſing ſuch a ſum, as the country was totally exhauſted, and their credit abſolutely deſtroyed, in conſequence of their inability to pay the intereſt of the capitals negociated in the courſe of the preceding year. He ſtill inſiſting upon finding the money before night, they offered to pay eighty thouſand florins, which they raiſed with the utmoſt difficulty, and begged the payment of the reſt might be poſtponed for a few weeks; but their requeſt was rejected with diſdain. The garriſon was reinforced by two battalions, and four ſquadrons diſperſed in the principal ſquares and markets in the city, and the gates were ſhut. They even planted cannon in the ſtreet, and tarred matches were fixed to many houſes, in order to intimidate the inhabitants. Theſe expedients proving ineffectual, detachments of grenadiers entered the houſes of the principal magiſtrates and merchants, from whence they removed all their beſt effects to the town-hall, where they were kept in depoſit, until they were redeemed with all the money that could poſſibly be raiſed. This exaction, ſo little conſiſtent with the character of a civilized nation, the French miniſter declared to the diet at Ratiſbon was agreeable to the inſtructions of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty.

By way of retaliation for the cruelty practiſed at Hanau, a detachment of the allied army under general Luckner was ſent to raiſe contributions in Fulda, and actually carried off hoſtages from that city; but retired before a ſtrong body of the enemy, who took poſſeſſion of the place. From hence the French marched, in their turn, to plunder the town of Hirchfeldt and Vacha. Accordingly they appeared at Vacha, ſituated on the frontiers of Heſſe, and forming the head of the chain of cantonments which the allies had on the Werra. This place was attacked with ſuch vigour that colonel Freytag, who commanded the poſt, was obliged to abandon the town; but he maintained himſelf on a riſing ground in the neighbourhood, where he amuſed the enemy, until two battalions of grenadiers came to his aſſiſtance. Thus reinforced, he repulſed the French, purſued them them for three leagues, and drove them with a conſiderable loſs from Giſſa, where they had reſolved to fix their quarters. Theſe ſkirmiſhes happened in the beginning of May, when the grand armies were juſt in motion to begin the campaign.

By this time the forces under the mareſchal duke de Broglio were augmented to one hundred thouſand; while the count de St. Germain commanded a ſeparate army on the Rhine, conſiſting of thirty thouſand men, aſſembled from the quarters of Duſſeldorp, Cologn, Cleves, and Weſel. This ſecond corps was intended to divide the allied army, which, by ſuch a diviſion, would be conſiderably weakened; and the French court threatened to form a third army, under the prince de Soubiſe; but this was never aſſembled. The duke de Broglio was in ſuch favour with the French miniſtry at this juncture, that he was promoted over the heads of many old generals, who now demanded and obtained their diſmiſſion; and every ſtep was taken to render the campaign glorious to this ſpirited commander: but, notwithſtanding all their care, and his own activity, he found it impoſſible to take the field early enough in the ſpring, from want of forage for his cavalry. While his quarters were eſtabliſhed at Frankfort, his troops were plentifully ſupplied with all ſorts of proviſion from the Upper Rhine; but this convenience depended upon his being maſter of the courſe of the river: nor could he move from this poſition without forfeiting the advantage, and providing magazines for the uſe of his forces; ſo that he was obliged to lie inactive until he could have the benefit of green forage in his march.

The ſame inconveniencies lay more heavy on prince Ferdinand, who, being in an exhauſted country, was obliged to fall back as far as Paderborn, and draw his ſupplies from Hamburgh and Bremen on the Elbe and the Weſer. By this time, however, he had received a reinforcement of Britiſh troops from Embden, under the command of major-general Griffin; and before the end of the campaign the forces of that nation in Germany were augmented to five and twenty thouſand. The allied army marched from their cantonments on the fifth day of May, and proceeded by the way of Paderborn to Fritzlar, where, on the twentieth, they encamped; but part of the troops left in the biſhopric of Munſter, under general Sporcken, were ordered to form a camp at Dulmen, to make head againſt the French corps commanded by the count de St. Germain.

General Imhoff was ſent with a detachment to Kirchayn on the Orme; and general Gilſoe, with another corps, advanced to the neighbourhood of Hirchfield on the Fulda. The former of theſe having ordered colonel Luckner to ſcour the country with a body of huſſars, that officer, on the twenty-fourth day of May, fell in with a French patrole, which gave the alarm at Butzcach, when the garriſon of that place, amounting to five hundred picquets, under general Waldener, fled with great precipitation. Being, however, purſued and overtaken near a wood, they were routed and diſperſed. Colonel Luckner, entering Butzbach, found a conſiderable quantity of forage, flour, wine, and equipage, belonging to the fugitives. What he could not carry off, he diſtributed among the poor inhabitants, and returned to general Imhoff's camp at Ameneburg, with above an hundred priſoners. This excurſion alarmed the enemy to ſuch a degree, that their whole army was put in motion; and the duke de Broglio, in perſon, advanced with a large body of troops as far as Friedberg: but underſtanding the allies had not quitted their camp at Fritzlar, he returned to Frankfort, after having cantoned that part of his army in the Wetteraw.

This alarm was not ſo mortifying as the ſeceſſion of the Wirtemberg troops, amounting to ten thouſand men, commanded by their duke in perſon, who left the French army in diſguſt, and returned to his own country. The Imperial army, under the prince de Deuxponts, quartered at Bamberg, began their march to Naumberg on the twentieth of May; but one of their detachments of cavalry having received a check from a body of Pruſſians near Lutzen, they fell back; and on the fourth day of June encamped at Lichtenſels upon the Maine. The ſmall detachments of the grand armies, as well as thoſe belonging to the bodies commanded by general Sporcken and the count de St. Germain in the neighbourhood of Duſſeldorp, ſkirmiſhed with various ſucceſs. The hereditary prince of Brunſwic being detached from the allied army, with ſome battalions of grenadiers and two regiments of Engliſh dragoons, advanced to the county of Fulda, where he was joined by the troops under general Gilſoe, and performed ſome inconſiderable exploits, particularly at Hoſenfeldt and Zietbach, where he ſurpriſed and took divers parties of the enemy.

By the twenty-fourth of June prince Ferdinand, quitting his camp at Fritzlar, advanced to Frillendorf, and took poſt on the hills between Zigenheim and Freyſa, general Imhoff commanding at a ſmall diſtance on the right, and the hereditary prince, now returned from Fulda, being ſtationed on the left of the army. In the mean time, the duke de Broglio, aſſembling his forces between Merlau and Laubach, advanced to Neuſtadt, where he encamped on the twenty-eighth day of the month, and at the ſame time occupied a ſtrong poſt at Waſſemburg. His intention was to penetrate through the country of Heſſe into Hanover, and make himſelf entirely maſter of that electorate. With this view he reſolved to effect a junction with the count de St. Germain, whom he ordered to advance towards Brilau and Corbach; while he himſelf decamping from Neuſtadt on the eighth day of July, advanced by the way of Frankenberg. Prince Ferdinand, having received intelligence that the count de St. Germain was in motion, began his march from Ziegenheim, and on the ninth day of July reached the heights of Brunau, in the neighbourhood of Wildungen.

The hereditary prince, at the head of the advanced corps, reinforced with ſome battalions and ſquadrons under major-general Griffin, was ſent forwards to Saxenhauſen, whither the army followed the next morning. The hereditary prince, continuing to advance, found the enemy already formed at Corbach; but ſuppoſing their whole force did not exceed ten thouſand infantry and ſeventeen ſquadrons, and being impelled by the ardour of his own courage, he reſolved to give them battle. He accordingly attacked them about two in the afternoon, and the action became very warm warm and obſtinate: but the enemy being continually reinforced with freſh battalions, and having the advantage of a numerous artillery, all the prince's efforts were ineffectual. Prince Ferdinand, being at too great a diſtance to ſupport him, ſent him an order to rejoin the army, which was by this time formed at Saxenhauſen. He forthwith made diſpoſitions for a retreat, which, however, was attended with great confuſion. The enemy perceiving the diſorder of the allied troops, plied their artillery with redoubled vigour; while a powerful body of their cavalry charged with irreſiſtible fury. In all likelihood, the whole infantry of the allies would have been cut off, had not the hereditary prince made a diverſion in their favour, by charging in perſon at the head of the Britiſh dragoons, who acted with their uſual gallantry and ſpirit. This reſpite furniſhed them with an opportunity of effecting their retreat to Saxenhauſen; but they loſt above five hundred men, and fifteen pieces of cannon. General count Keilmanſegge, major-general Griffin, and major Hill of Bland's dragoons, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their conduct and intrepidity on this occaſion.

The hereditary prince expoſed his life in the hotteſt part of the action, and received a ſlight wound in the ſhoulder, which gave him far leſs uneaſineſs than he felt from the chagrin and mortification produced by his defeat.

Many days, however, did not paſs, before he found an opportunity of retrieving his honour. Prince Ferdinand, receiving intelligence that a body of the enemy, commanded by major-general Glaubitz, had advanced on the left of the allies to Ziegenheim, detached the hereditary prince to oppoſe them, at the head of ſix battalions of Hanoverians and Heſſians, with Elliot's regiment of light horſe, Luckner's huſſars, and two brigades of Chaſſeurs. On the ſixteenth day of the month, he attacked the enemy near the village of Exdorff, and a very warm action enſued, in which Elliot's regiment performed feats of the moſt undaunted valour. Though this was the firſt time they had appeared in the field, they out-did in courage the moſt experienced veterans. They charged five different times, and broke through the enemy at every charge: but theſe exploits they did not atchieve without ſuſtaining a heavy loſs in officers, men, and horſes. At length victory declared for the allies. Five batralions of the enemy, including the commander in chief, and the prince of Anhalt Cothen, were taken, with ſix pieces of cannon, and all their arms, baggage, and artillery.

During theſe tranſactions, the mareſchal duke de Broglio remained encamped on the heights of Corbach. He had, in advancing from Frankfort, left detachments to reduce the caſtles of Marpurg and Dillemburg, which were occupied by the allies; and they fell into his hands, the garriſons of both being obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. Theſe were but inconſiderable conqueſts; nor did the progreſs of the French general equal the idea which had been formed of his talents and activity. The count de St. Germain, who was his ſenior officer, and believed by many to be at leaſt his equal in capacity, having now joined his corps to the grand army, and conceiving diſguſt at his being obliged to ſerve under the duke de Broglio, threw up his command, in which he was ſucceeded by the chevalier de Muy. At the ſame time, the marquis de Voyer, and the count de Luc, two generals of experience and reputation, quitted the army, and returned to France, actuated by the ſame motives.

The allied army having advanced from Saxenhauſen to the village of Halle, near Caſſel, remained in that ſituation till the thirtieth day of July, when the troops were again put in motion. The chevalier de Muy, having croſſed the Dymel at Stadtbergen, with the reſerve of the French army, amounting to thirty-five thouſand men, and extending theſe troops down the banks of the river, in order to cut off the communication of the allies with Weſtphalia; while the duke de Broglio marched up with his main body to their camp at Kalle, and prince Xavier of Saxony, who commanded their reſerve on the left, advanced towards Caſſel; prince Ferdinand, leaving general Kielmanſegge with a body of forces for the defence of that city, decamped in the night of the thirtieth, and paſſed the Dymel without loſs, between Liebenau and Dringleberg. The hereditary prince, who had the preceding day croſſed the ſame river, in order to reinforce general Sporcken, who was poſted near Corbeke, now reconnoitred the poſition of the enemy, and found them poſſeſſed of a very advantageous camp between Warbourg and Ochſendorff. Prince Ferdinand, having reſolved to attack them, ordered the hereditary prince and Mr. Sporcken to turn their left, while he himſelf advanced againſt their front, with the main body of his army.

The enemy was accordingly attacked, almoſt at the ſame inſtant, both in flank and in rear, with equal impetuoſity and ſucceſs. As the infantry of the allied army could not march faſt enough to charge at the ſame time, the marquis of Granby was ordered to advance with the cavalry of the right; and the brigade of Engliſh artillery, commanded by captain Philips, made ſuch expedition, that they were up in time to ſecond the attack in a moſt ſurprizing manner. All the French cavalry, except three ſquadrons, fled with precipitation at the approach of the marquis; and theſe were entirely broke at the very firſt charge. Then the Engliſh horſe fell upon the enemy's infantry, which ſuffered greatly, while the town of Warbourg was aſſaulted by the Britannic legion. The French being hard preſſed on both flanks, as well as in front and rear, betook themſelves to flight, with conſiderable damage, occaſioned chiefly by the Britiſh cannon and dragoons, and many were drowned in attempting to ford the Dymel. The battalion of Maxwell, and a brigade under general Beckwith, compoſed of grenadiers and Highlanders, diſtinguiſhed themſelves remarkably on this occaſion. The enemy left about fifteen hundred men, killed or wounded, in the field of battle, with ſome colours, and ten pieces of cannon, and about the ſame number were taken priſoners. Monſieur de Muy lay all night under arms, on the heights of Volk-Miſſen, from whence he retired to Wolfshagen. On the evening of the battle, the marquis of Granby received orders to paſs the river in purſuit of them, with twelve Britiſh battalions, and ten ſquadrons, and encamped at Wilda, about four miles from Warbourg, the heights of which were occupied by the enemy's grand army.

By this ſucceſs, prince Ferdinand was enabled to maintain his communication with Weſtphalia, and keep keep the enemy at a diſtance from the heart of Hanover; but to theſe objects he was obliged to ſacrifice the country of Caſſel; for prince Xavier of Saxony, at the head of a detached body, much more numerous than that which was left under general Kielmanſegge, advanced towards Caſſel, and made himſelf maſter of that city; then he reduced Munden, Gottingen, and Elmbeck, in the electorate of Hanover. All that prince Ferdinand could do, conſidering how much he was out-numbered by the French, was to ſecure poſts and paſſes with a view to retard their progreſs, and employ detachments to harraſs and ſurpriſe their advanced parties.

In a few days after the action at Warbourg, general Luckner repulſed a French detachment which had advanced as far as Elmbeck, and ſurpriſed another at Nordheim. About the ſame time colonel Donap, with a body of the allied army, attacked a French corps of two thouſand men, poſted in the wood of Sababourg, to maintain the communication between their grand army and their troops on the other ſide of the Weſer; and, notwithſtanding the ſtrength of their ſituation, drove them from their poſt, with the loſs of five hundred men, either killed or made priſoners: but this advantage was more than counterbalanced by the reduction of Ziegenhain, garriſoned by ſeven hundred men of the allied army, who, after a vigorous reſiſtance, were forced to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. On the fifth day of Auguſt, prince Ferdinand being encamped at Buhne, received intimation that a conſiderable body of the enemy, amounting to upwards of twenty thouſand men, were preparing to make a general forage in the neighbourhood of Geiſmar. He immediately formed a reſolution to defeat their intention. With this view he paſſed the Dymel early in the morning, with a body of troops and ſome artillery, and poſted them in ſuch an advantageous manner as to oblige the enemy to abandon their purpoſe.

On the ſame morning the hereditary prince ſet out on an expedition to beat up the quarters of a French detachment. Being informed that a body of their horſe and foot, amounting to upwards of two thouſand men, were cantoned at Zierenberg, at a ſmall diſtance from the French camp at Dierenberg, and paſſed their time in the moſt careleſs ſecurity, he advanced towards them from his camp at Warbourg. About a league on the other ſide of the Dymel, at the village of Witzen, they were joined by the light troops under major Bulow; and now the diſpoſition was made, both for entering the town, and ſecuring a retreat, in caſe of being repulſed.

When they had arrived within two miles, they divided into three bodies, which took three different routes, by which the place was completely ſurrounded. At eight in the evening they ſet out from Warbourg, and came before this place at two the following morning. Notwithſtanding the precautions taken, the trampling of the troops over the gardens gave the alarm to a guard of the enemy's dragoons, who immediately began to fire. Strict orders had been given to proceed with as little noiſe as poſſible, and to reſerve their fire; and ſuch was the deliberate courage, ſuch the perfect diſcipline of the Britiſh forces, that they ſuſtained the enemy's fire, puſhed on with their bayonets, drove back the French piquets, killed the guard at the gate, and entered the towns along with the fugitives, without the leaſt noiſe, hurry, or confuſion. Never was ſurprize more complete.

The column of the Britiſh forces having forced the gate, advanced regularly with their bayonets fixed, and without firing a muſquet, through the two ſtreets that led to their church-yard (which, being the only open part of the town, ſerved the French as a place of arms) killing or taking a great number of thoſe who ran from the houſes towards this place of rendezvous; and thus they advanced with the greateſt order and the moſt profound ſilence, until they reached the church-yard. The night was ſo dark, that they formed by the ſide of the French, who for a while took them to be their own piquets that had aſſembled: but they were ſoon undeceived: a fierce encounter with bayonets enſued, in which the French were quickly obliged to give way. Two regiments of the enemy's dragoons endeavoured to fly to their camp; but they found it occupied by four hundred grenadiers, who drove them back with their bayonets. Forced from hence, they fled to another gate; but there they were repulſed with a ſharp fire of ſmall arms. Then they were compelled to ſeparate; and flying at random as fortune and the night directed, made their eſcape at the ſeveral breaches of the wall. The prince was maſter of the place in about an hour; but the nearneſs of the French camp and the approach of day, prevented ſo long a continuance in the town as he wiſhed for reaping the full fruits of his victory: therefore about three o'clock he began his retreat, carrying off two pieces of cannon, thirty-ſix officers, and about five hundred private men. The ſlaughter alſo of the enemy was conſiderable. The prince reached his camp without the leaſt moleſtation in his retreat.

If we conſider the difficulty of this attempt, very few have been bolder; if we examine the diſpoſitions, none could be conducted with greater wiſdom; if we attend to the behaviour of the troops we ſhall no where find an example of more exact obedience, diſcipline, and courage. To attack ſo large a body of the enemy ſo ſtrongly poſted, within little more than a league of their grand camp; to march ſo far in that critical ſituation, and in a very dark night; to divide into ſo many parts, yet to act with ſo much order and ſo entire a concert, was certainly an exploit of the very firſt rank; and, though not of any great importance in its conſequences, is ſo admirable in its conduct and execution, that it well deſerves to be particularly narrated. This added greatly to the reputation of the Engliſh as ſoldiers, and no leſs to their honour as men, by the humanity they ſhewed to their priſoners, and the generous ſentiments of the common ſort with regard to money, as there were ſeveral noble inſtances that night of their refuſing to take any thing from their priſoners, who had offered them their purſes. They loſt but ten men.

From this period the operations of the two armies, which for a time ſeemed to languiſh, were renewed with freſh vigour. Prince Ferdinand perceived, that whilſt the enemy's communication with the Rhine, and with Frankfort on the Maine, continued open, it would be to very little purpoſe to attempt any thing either for the relief of Gottingen or Caſſel. Their progreſs indeed into Hanover had been checked; but whilſt they ſtill continued in ſo advanced a poſition, it was evidently impoſſible to prevent their making very ruinous inroads into that country. To force them to a battle againſt their inclination, would be difficult, and the attempt itſelf dangerous. There remained but one method, which was to make frequent and ſtrong detachments into the ſouthern parts of Heſſe and Wetteravia, and thus render precarious the enemy's communication with the Rhine and Maine, from whence they drew the greateſt part of their ſupplies of all kinds.

With this view he detached major Bulow at the head of a ſtrong corps, who puſhed forward toward Marpurg, ſurpriſed the town, deſtroyed the French ovens, and brought off a conſiderable quantity of ſtores and baggage, with ſome priſoners. He met with the ſame ſucceſs at Butzbach, where he ſurprized and took two companies belonging to the regiment of Raugrave, and retired with his body to Frankenberg, where he joined colonel Forſen. On the twelfth day of September they made a movement towards Frankenau; and M. de Stainville, who was poſted with a body of French troops at Merdenhagen, advanced to check their progreſs. He came up with their rear in the neighbourhood of Munden, and attacked them in paſſing the river Orck with ſuch vigour, that Forſen, with ſome of his cavalry, was taken, and Bulow obliged to abandon ſome pieces of cannon.

The action was juſt determined when this laſt was reinforced by the hereditary prince of Brunſwic, who had made a forced march of five German miles, which had fatigued the troops to ſuch a degree, that he deferred his attack till next morning; but in the mean time, M. de Stainville retired towards Frankenberg. The Hanoverian general Wangenheim, at the head of four battalions and ſix ſquadrons, had driven the enemy from the defiles of Soheite, and encamped at Lawenthagen; but, being attacked by a ſuperior number, he was obliged in his turn to give way, and his retreat was not effected without the loſs of two hundred men, and ſome pieces of artillery. When the enemy retired, general Wangenheim repaſſed the Weſer, and occupied his former ſituation at Uſſar. Mean while, general Luckner gained an advantage over a detachment of French cavalry near Norten. Prince Ferdinand, when mareſchal Broglio quitted his camp at Immenhauſen, made a motion of his troops, and eſtabliſhed his head quarters at Geiſmarwells, the reſidence of the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel: from thence, however, he transferred them about the latter end of September to Ovilgune, on the Weſtphalian ſide of the Dymel.

Such was the poſition of the two oppoſite grand armies, when the world was ſurpriſed by an expedition to the Lower Rhine, made by the hereditary prince of Brunſwic. Whether this excurſion was intended to hinder the French from reinforcing their army in Weſtphalia, or to co-operate in the Low Countries with the armament now ready equipped in the ports of England; or to gratify the ambition of a young prince, overboiling with courage, and glowing with the deſire of conqueſt, certain it is, the Auſtrian Netherlands were at this juncture entirely deſtitute of troops, except the French garriſons of Oſtend and Nieuport, which were weak and inconſiderable. Had ten thouſand Engliſh troops been landed on the coaſt of Blankenburg, they might have taken poſſeſſion of Bruges, Ghent, Bruſſels, and Antwerp, without reſiſtance, and joined the hereditary prince in the heart of the country: in that caſe, he would have found himſelf at the head of thirty thouſand men, and might have made ſuch a diverſion in favour of Hanover, as to transfer the ſeat of war from Weſtphalia into Flanders. The empreſs-queen might indeed have complained of this invaſion, as the formality of declaring war againſt her had not been obſerved by Great Britain; but, conſidering that ſhe was the declared enemy of Hanover, and had violated the barrier-treaty, in eſtabliſhing which the kingdom of Great Britain had laviſhed ſo much blood and treaſure; a ſtep of this kind, it was thought, might have been taken without any imputation of perfidy or injuſtice.

Whatever were the motives for the prince's expedition, he certainly quitted the grand army of the allies in the month of September, and traverſing Weſtphalia with twenty battalions and ten ſquadrons, appeared on the Lower Rhine, marching by Schermbeck and Duſſeldorp. On the twenty-ninth day of the month he ſent a large detachment over the river at Rocroot, which ſurpriſed part of the French partizan Fiſcher's corps at Rhynberg, and ſcoured the country. Next day, other parties croſſing at Rees and Emerick, took poſſeſſion of ſome redoubts which the French had raiſed along the bank of the river; and here they found a number of boats ſufficient to tranſport the reſt of the forces. Then the prince advanced to Cleves, and at his approach the French garriſon, conſiſting of five hundred men, under the command of M. de Barrel, retired into the caſtle, which however they did not long defend; for on the third day of October they capitulated, and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, after having in vain endeavoured to obtain more favourable conditions.

A more important object was Weſel, which the prince inveſted, and began to beſiege in form. The approaches were made on the right of the Rhine, while the prince in perſon remained on the left to cover the ſiege; and preſerved his communication open with the other ſide, by a bridge above and another below the place. He had hoped to carry it by a vigorous aſſault, without the formality of a regular ſiege; but he met with a warmer reception than he expected; and his operations were retarded by heavy rains, which, by ſwelling the river, endangered his bridges, and laid his trenches under water. The difficulties and delays occaſioned by this circumſtance entirely diſappointed his deſign. The French being informed of his motions, were not ſlow in taking meaſures to anticipate his ſucceſs. M. de Caſtres was detached after him with thirty battalions and thirty-eight ſquadrons; and by forced marches arrived, on the fourteenth day of October, at Rhynberg, where the prince's light troops were poſted. Theſe he attacked immediately, and compelled to abandon the poſt, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the prince, who commanded in perſon, and appeared in the warmeſt part of this ſhort but ſanguinary affair. The enemy, leaving five battalions with ſome ſquadrons at Rhynberg, proceeded by the left, and encamped behind the convent of Campen.

The

The prince having received intimation that M. de Caſtries was not yet joined by ſome reinforcements that were on the march, determined to be before-hand with them, and attempt that very night to ſurpriſe him in his camp. For this purpoſe he began his march at ten in the evening, after having left four battalions and five ſquadrons under general Bock, with inſtructions to obſerve Rhynberg, and attack that poſt in caſe the attempt on Campen ſhould ſucceed. Before the allied forces could reach the enemy's camp, they were under the neceſſity of overpowering Fiſcher's corps of irregulars, which occupied the convent of Campen, at the diſtance of half a league in their front. This ſervice occaſioned ſome firing, the noiſe of which alarmed the French army. Their commander formed them with great expedition, and poſted them in a wood, where they were immediately attacked, and at firſt obliged to give ground; but they ſoon found means to recover their ranks, and ſuſtained, without flinching, an unceaſing fire of muſquetry, from five in the morning till nine at night, when they reaped the fruits of their perſeverance. The hereditary prince, whoſe horſe was killed under him, ſeeing no proſpect of ſucceſs in prolonging an action which had already coſt him a conſiderable number of men, thought proper to give orders for a retreat, which was not effected without confuſion, and left the field of battle to the enemy. His loſs on this occaſion did not fall ſhort of ſixteen hundred choice men, killed, wounded, and taken; and this loſs fell chiefly on the troops of Great Britain, who were always found in the hotteſt parts of the battle. All their officers, both of infantry and dragoons, diſtinguiſhed themſelves remarkably, and many were dangerouſly wounded. Among theſe, the nation regretted the loſs of lord Downe, whoſe wounds proved mortal: he was a young nobleman of ſpirit, who had lately embraced a military life, though he was not regularly trained up in the ſervice.

Next day, which was the ſixteenth of October, the enemy attacked an advanced body of the allies, which was poſted in a wood before Elverick, and extended along the Rhine. The firing of cannon and muſquetry was maintained till night. Mean while, a column of the French infantry, commanded by M. de Chabot, marched through Walach, and took poſt among the thickets, at the diſtance of a quarter of a league, in the front of the prince's army. By this time, the Rhine was ſo much ſwelled by the rains, and the banks of it were overflowed in ſuch a manner, that it was neceſſary to repair and move lower down the bridge, which had been thrown over that river. This work was accordingly performed in preſence of the enemy, and the prince, paſſing without moleſtation, proceeded to Bruynen, where he fixed his head-quarters. His paſſing the Rhine ſo eaſily, not only under the eye, but alſo within the graſp of a ſuperior and victorious army, may be reckoned among the fortunate incidents of his life.

In the month of November, while he lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Schermbeck, a body of the enemy attempted to beat up his quarters: having received intimation of their deſign, he immediately called in his advanced poſts, and made a diſpoſition for giving them a proper reception. He abandoned the tents that were in the front of his camp, and poſted his infantry in ambuſcade behind thoſe that were in the rear: at the ſame time he ordered ſome regiments of horſe and huſſars to take a compaſs, and fall upon the back of the enemy. The ſtratagem was crown'd with the deſired ſucceſs. The French detachment, believing the allies had actually abandoned their camp, began to pillage the tents in the utmoſt diſorder: then the infantry ſallied from the place where they were concealed, and fell upon them with irreſiſtible fury; the artillery opened, and the cavalry charged them in flank. In a word, of twelve hundred who marched from Weſel on this expedition, ſcarce two hundred eſcaped.

The duke de Broglio attempted, by ſundry means, to take advantage of the allied army on the other ſide of the Weſer, thus weakened by the abſence of the troops under the hereditary prince; but he found prince Ferdinand too vigilant to be ſurpriſed, and too ſtrongly ſituated to be attacked with any proſpect of ſucceſs. He therefore contented himſelf with waſting the country by detachments: he ſent M. de Stainville with a conſiderable body of forces to penetrate into the heart of Hanover; and on the fifteenth day of September, that officer falling in with a detachment of the allies, commanded by major Bulow, attacked them near the abbey of Schaken. After a warm and obſtinate engagement, they were defeated and purſued to Bulemont, with the loſs of their cannon, baggage, and a good number of men, who fell into the hands of the victors. After this exploit, M. de Stainville advanced to Halberſtadt, and demanded of that capital a contribution of one million five hundred thouſand livres; but the citizens had been ſo exhauſted by former exactions, that they could not raiſe above thirty thouſand: for the remainder the French partizan took hoſtages, with whom he returned to the grand army encamped at Caſſel, from whence they, in a little time, fell back as far as Gottingen.

As the enemy retired, prince Ferdinand advanced as far as Hurſte, where he fixed his head quarters about the latter end of November. While he continued in this poſition, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened in the neighbourhood of Gottingen. Major-general Breidenbach, at the head of two regiments of Hanoverian and Brunſwick guards, with a detachment of cavalry, attacked on the twenty-ninth day of November, the French poſt at Heydemunden, upon the river Worrau. This he carried, together with the town, which the enemy haſtily abandoned. Part of their detachment croſſed the river in boats; the reſt threw themſelves into an intrenchment that covered the paſſage, which the allies endeavoured to force in ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, galled as they were by the fire of the enemy's redoubts on the other ſide of the river. At length M. Breidenbach was obliged to deſiſt and retire into the town, from whence he withdrew at midnight, after having ſuſtained conſiderable damage.

Prince Ferdinand had it very much at heart to drive the French from Gottingen, and accordingly inveſted that city; but the French garriſon, which was numerous and well provided, made ſuch a vigorous reſiſtance, as baffled all the attempts of the allies, who were moreover incommoded by the rainy rainy weather, which, added to other conſiderations, prevented them from undertaking the ſiege in form. Nevertheleſs, they kept the place blocked up from the twenty-ſecond day of November to the twelfth of the following month, when the garriſon, in a deſperate ſally, took one of their principal poſts, and compelled them to abandon the enterprize. About the middle of December, prince Ferdinand withdrew into winter quarters, he himſelf reſiding at Uſlar, and the Engliſh troops being cantoned in the biſhopric of Paderborn. Thus the enemy were left in poſſeſſion of Heſſe, and the whole country eaſtward of the Weſer to the frontiers of the electorate of Hanover.

The king of Pruſſia, after all his labours, notwithſtanding the great talents he had diſplayed, and the incredible efforts he had made, ſtill found himſelf environed by his enemies, and in danger of being cruſhed, by their cloſing and contracting their circle. Even the Swedes, who had languiſhed ſo long, ſeemed to be rouſed to action in Pomerania, during the ſeverity of the winter-ſeaſon. The Pruſſian general Manteuffel had, on the twentieth day of January, croſſed the river Peene, repulſed the advanced poſts of the enemy at Ziethen, and penetrated as far as the neighbourhood of Grieſſwalde; but finding the Swedes on their guard, he returned to Anclam, where his head quarters were eſtabliſhed. This inſult was ſoon retaliated with intereſt. On the twenty-eighth day of the month, at five in the morning, a body of Swedes attacked the Pruſſian troops poſted in the ſuburbs of Anclam, on the other ſide of the Peene, and drove them into the city, which they entered pell mell. General Manteuffel, being alarmed, endeavoured to rally the troops, but was wounded and taken, with about two hundred men and three pieces of cannon. The victors, having performed this exploit, returned to their own quarters. As for the Ruſſian army, which had wintered on the other ſide of the Viſtula, the ſeaſon was pretty far advanced before it could take the field; though general Tottleben was detached from it about the beginning of June, at the head of ten thouſand Coſſacks, and other light troops, with which he made an inroad into Pomerania, and fixed his head quarters at Belgard.

At the beginning of the campaign the king of Pruſſia's chief aim was to take meaſures for the defence of Sileſia, the conqueſt of which ſeemed to be the principal object which the court of Vienna had in view. While the Auſtrian army under count Daun lay ſtrongly intrenched in the neighbourhood of Dreſden, the king of Pruſſia had attempted, in the month of December, to make him quit that advantageous ſituation, by cutting off his proviſions, and making an incurſion into Bohemia. For theſe purpoſes he had taken poſſeſſion of Dippeſwalde, Maxen, and Pretchendorff, as if he intended to enter Bohemia by the way of Paſsberg; but this ſcheme being found impracticable, he returned to his camp at Freyberg; and in January the Pruſſian and Auſtrian armies were cantoned ſo near each other that daily ſkirmiſhes were fought with various ſucceſs. The head of the Pruſſian camp was occupied by a body of four thouſand men under general Zettwitz, who, upon the twenty-ninth day of January was attacked with ſuch irreſiſtible fury by the Auſtrian general Beck, that he retreated in great confuſion to Torgau, with the loſs of five hundred men, eight pieces of artillery, and a conſiderable quantity of new cloathing, and other baggage.

Another advantage of the ſame nature was gained by the Auſtrians at Newſtadt over a ſmall body of Pruſſians who guarded that city. In the month of march general Laudohn advanced with a ſtrong detachment of horſe and foot, in order to ſurpriſe the Pruſſians, who, in endeavouring to accompliſh a retreat to Steinau, were ſurrounded accordingly, and very roughly handled. General Laudohn ſummoned them twice by ſound of trumpet to lay down their arms; but their commanders, the captains Blumenthal and Zittzwitz, rejecting the propoſal with diſdain, the enemy attacked them on all hands with a great ſuperiority of number. In this emergency the Pruſſian captains formed their troops into a ſquare, and by a cloſe continued fire kept the enemy at bay; until, perceiving that the Croats had taken poſſeſſion of a wood between Siebenhauſen and Steinau, they, in apprehenſion of being intercepted, abandoned their baggage, and forced their way to Steinau, which they reached with great difficulty, having been continually harraſſed by the Auſtrians, who paid dear for this advantage. Several other petty exploits of this kind were atchieved by detachments on both ſides, before the campaign was opened by the grand armies.

Towards the end of April, the king of Pruſſia altered his poſition, and withdrew that part of his chain of cantonments, which extended from the foreſt of Thurundt to the right of the Elbe. He now took poſſeſſion of a very ſtrong camp, between the Elbe and the Mulda, which he intrenched in every part that was acceſſible, and fortified with two hundred and fifty pieces of cannon. By theſe precautions he was enabled to keep his ground againſt the army of count Daun, and at the ſame time detach a body of troops as a reinforcement to his brother prince Henry, who collected a ſeparate army near Franckfort upon the Oder, that he might be at hand either to oppoſe the Ruſſians, or march to the relief of Sileſia, which the enemy was bent upon invading. It was for this purpoſe that the Auſtrian general Laudohn advanced with a conſiderable army into Luſatia, about the beginning of May, and general Beck with another body of troops took poſſeſſion of Cotbus. Mean while count Daun continued in his old ſituation on the Elbe; general Lacy commanded a ſmall detached army upon the frontiers of Saxony, to the ſouthward of Dreſden; and the prince de Deux-ponts marched into the ſame neighbourhood with the army of the empire.

Prince Henry of Pruſſia having encamped with his army for ſome time at Sagan in Sileſia, proceeded from thence to Gorlitz in Luſatia, to watch the motions of general Laudohn, encamped at Koningſgratz; from whence, in the beginning of June, he marched into the county of Glatz, and advanced to the neighbourhood of Schweidnitz, which he ſeemed determined to beſiege, having a train of eighty pieces of cannon. In order to diſappoint his deſign, prince Henry reinforced the body of troops under general Fouquet; and at the ſame time ſent a detachment into Pomerania under colonel Leſſow, who defeated the rear-guard of general Tottleben, and obliged that officer to abandon Pomerania. By this time, however, the mareſchal Soltikoff had arrived from Peterſbourg, and taken the command of the grand Ruſſian army, which paſſed the Viſtula in June, and began its march towards the frontiers of Sileſia.

In the month of June general Laudohn made a fruitleſs attempt to carry Glatz by aſſault; but he was more ſucceſsful in his next enterprize. Underſtanding that general Fouquet, who occupied the poſt at Landſhut, had weakened himſelf by ſending off detachments under the major-generals Ziethen and Grant, he reſolved to attack him with ſuch a ſuperiority of number as he ſhould not be able to withſtand. Accordingly, on the twenty-third day of June, at two in the morning, he began the aſſault with his whole army upon ſome redoubts which Fouquet poſſeſſed; and theſe were carried one after another, though not without a deſperate oppoſition. General Fouquet being ſummoned to ſurrender, refuſed to ſubmit; and having received two wounds, was at length taken priſoner: about three hundred of his men eſcaped to Breſlau; the reſt were killed or taken; but the loſs of the victors conſiderably exceeded that of the vanquiſhed. In July general Laudohn undertook the ſiege of Glatz, which was taken after a very faint reſiſtance; for, on the very day that the batteries were opened againſt the place, the garriſon abandoned part of the fortifications, which the beſiegers immediately occupied. The Pruſſians made repeated efforts to regain the ground they had loſt, but they were repulſed in all their attempts. At length the garriſon laid down their arms, and ſurrendered at diſcretion. In this place the enemy found an immenſe magazine, including above one hundred braſs cannon, a great number of mortars, and a vaſt quantity of ammunition.

Laudohn, encouraged by the reduction of Glatz, advanced immediately to Breſlau, which he began to bombard with great fury; but his chief hopes of ſucceſs conſiſted in carrying the place by a ſudden attack, or intimidating count Tavenzein the governor into an immediate ſurrender; for he knew the Ruſſian army was at a conſiderable diſtance, and judged, from the character of prince Henry of Pruſſia, that he would advance to the relief of the place long before it could be taken according to the uſual forms.

Influenced by theſe conſiderations, when he had inveſted the town, he ſent a letter to the governor, ſpecifying, that his army conſiſted of fifty battalions and fourſcore ſquadrons; that the Ruſſian army, amounting to ſeventy-five thouſand men, was within three days march of Breſlau; that no ſuccour could be expected from the king of Pruſſia, encamped as he was on the other ſide of the Elbe, and overawed by the army of count Daun; that prince Henry, far from being in a condition to bring relief, would not not be able to ſtand his ground againſt the Ruſſians; that Breſlau being an open mercantile town, not a fortreſs, could not be defended without contravening the eſtabliſhed rules of war; and therefore the governor, in caſe of obſtinacy, had no reaſon to expect an honourable capitulation, the benefit of which was now offered. He at the ſame time ſent a memorial to the civil magiſtrates, threatening their town with deſtruction, which could by no other means be prevented than by joining with the inhabitants in perſuading the governor to embrace immediately the terms that were propoſed.

Count Tavenzein, inſtead of being intimidated, was encouraged by theſe menaces, which implied an apprehenſion in Laudohn that the place would be relieved. He therefore replied to the ſummons he had received, that Breſlau was not ſimply a mercantile town, but ought to be conſidered as a place of ſtrength, as being ſurrounded with works and wet ditches: that the Auſtrians themſelves had defended it as ſuch after the battle of Liſſa, in the year 1757; that the king his maſter having commanded him to defend the place to the laſt extremity, he could neither comply with general Laudohn's propoſals, nor pay the leaſt regard to his threats of deſtroying the town, as he had not been intruſted with the care of the houſes, but with the defence of the fortifications. The Auſtrian convinced him that ſame evening that he threatened nothing but what he meaned to perform. He opened his batteries, and poured in upon the town a moſt terrible ſhower of bombs and red hot bullets, which continued till midnight. During this dreadful diſcharge, which filled the place with horror and deſolation, he attempted the out-works by aſſault. The Croats attacked the covered way in different places with their uſual impetuoſity; but were repulſed with conſiderable loſs, by the conduct and reſolution of the governor and garriſon. Theſe proceedings having made no impreſſion upon Tavenzein, the beſieging general had recourſe again to negociation, and offered the moſt flattering articles of capitulation, which were rejected with diſdain. The governor gave him to underſtand, that the deſtruction of the town had made no change in his reſolution, though it was a practice contrary to the law of arms, as well as to the dictates of common humanity, to begin the ſiege of a fortreſs by ruining the inhabitants: finally, he aſſured him he would wait for him upon the ramparts, and defend the place to the utmoſt of his power.

To this extremity, however, he was not obliged to have recourſe. Prince Henry of Pruſſia, one of the moſt accompliſhed generals of the age, having received repeated intelligence that the Ruſſian army intended to join Laudohn at Breſlau, determined to advance, and give them battle before the purpoſed junction. In the latter end of July he ſet out from Gleiſſen, and on the laſt day of that month had arrived at Linden near Slauve, where he learned that Tottleben's detachment only had paſſed through the plains of Polnich-Liſſa, and that the grand Ruſſian army had marched through Koſten and Guſtin. The prince, finding it impoſſible to overtake them by that route, directed his march to Glogau, where he heard that Breſlau was beſieged by general Laudohn, and immediately advanced by forced marches to its relief. With ſuch celerity did he proceed, that in five days he marched above one hundred and twenty Engliſh miles, and at his approach the Auſtrian general relinquiſhed his enterprize. Thus, by his ſpirited and prudent conduct, he not only prevented the junction of the Ruſſian and Auſtrian armies, but alſo ſaved the capital of Sileſia, and ſtreightened Laudohn in ſuch a manner as ſubjected him to a defeat by the Pruſſian monarch, to whoſe motions it is now time to attend.

Whether his design was originally upon Dresden, or he proposed to act in concert with his brother prince Henry in Silesia, which his adversaries seemed to have chosen as the scene of their operations, we shall not pretend to determine: certain it is, in the beginning of July he began his march in two columns through Lusatia; and count Daun being apprised of his march, ordered his army to be put in motion. Committing the defence of Saxony to the army of the empire, and to the body of the troops under Lacy, he proceeded with great expedition towards Silesia, in full persuasion that the Prussian monarch had thither directed his route. On the seventh day of July the king, knowing that Daun was now removed at a distance, repassed the Pulsnitz, which he had crossed but two days before, and advanced with the van of his army towards Lichtenberg, in order to attack the forces of general Lacy, who was there encamped; but the Austrian retired at his approach. Then the army advanced to Marienstern, when the king understood that count Daun was in full march for Lauban, having already gained two marches upon the Prussians. Perhaps it was this intimation that induced the king to alter his plan, and return to the Elbe. On the eighth day of the month he repassed the Sprehe, in the neighbourhood of Bautzen, and proceeded towards Dresden with extraordinary diligence. On the thirteenth his army having passed the Elbe at Kadetz, on a bridge of boats, took post between Pirna and Dresden, which last he determined to besiege, in hope of reducing it before count Daun could return to its relief. In this expectation, however, he had the misfortune to be disappointed. General Macguire the governor being summoned to surrender, replied, that having the honour to be intrusted with the defence of the capital, he would maintain it till the last extremity. Batteries were immediately erected against the town on both sides of the Elbe, and the place overwhelmed with a dreadful bombardment; but this expedient proved altogether ineffectual. Though the suburbs towards the Pirna gate were attacked and carried, this advantage made no impression on general Macguire, who made several vigorous sallies, and took every necessary precaution for the defence of the city; encouraged moreover by the vicinity of Lacy's body and the army of the empire, encamped in an advantageous situation near Gros Seydlitz; and confident that count Daun would hasten to his relief: nor was it long before his expectations were answered. The Austrian general finding himself outwitted by the stratagem of the Prussian monarch, and being informed of his enterprize against Dresden, instantly wheeled about, and marched back with such rapidity, that on the nineteenth day of the month he arrived in the neighbourhood of that capital. In consequence of his approach, the king of Prussia, whose heavy artillery was now come up, redoubled his efforts against the city, so as to reduce to ashes the cathedral church, the new square, several noble streets, some palaces, together with the curious manufactory of porcelaine. These calamities, however, affected neither the fortifications nor the garrison, which count Daun found means to reinforce with sixteen battalions. This supply, and the neighbourhood of three hostile armies, rendered it altogether impossible to prosecute the siege with any prospect of success: the king therefore relinquished the enterprize, withdrew his troops and artillery, and endeavoured to bring Daun to a battle, which that general artfully declined.

The fate of this prince seemed now at its crisis. Notwithstanding all the efforts of his brother prince Henry, the Russians were fast advancing to join Laudohn, who had already blocked up Schweidnitz and Neiss, and their junction seemed to threaten the loss of all Silesia. The king had nothing to oppose to superior numbers, but superior activity, of which he determined to avail himself without delay. Instead of making a feint towards Silesia, he resolved to march thither in earnest; and with that view passing the Elbe, encamped at Dallwitz, on the farther bank of the river, leaving general Hulsen with fifteen thousand men in the intrenched camp at Schlettow, to preserve his footing in Saxony. On the third day of August he began his march for Silesia, followed by count Daun with the grand Austrian army, while the detached body under Lacy took post at Rechenberg, and the imperial army encamped at Xesseldorf. Both the Prussians and Austrians marched at the rate of one hundred miles in five days. On the tenth the king took possession of the camp of Lignitz; and here he seemed in danger of being quite environed by the enemy, who occupied the whole ground between Parchwitz and Cossendau, an extent of thirty miles. Count Daun's army lay in the center of this chain, possessing the Heights of Whalstadt and Hochkirk; general Laudohn covered the ground between Jeschendorf and Coschitz: the rising grounds of Parchwitz were secured by general Nauendorff; and M. de Beck, who formed the left, extended his troops beyond Cossendau.

The king marched, in the night of the eleventh, with a view to turn the enemy, and advance to Jauer: but at break of day he discovered a new camp at Prausnitz, which consisted of Lacy's detachment, just arrived from Lauban. The Prussians immediately crossed the Katzbach to attack this general; but he made such a skilful disposition for a retreat towards the army of count Daun, that he not only baffled the attempts of the king to bring him to action, but, by posting himself on the Heights of Hennersdorff, prevented his march to Jauer. In vain did the Prussian monarch endeavour next day to turn the enemy on the side of the mountain, by Pomsen and Jagersdorff; the roads were found impassable to the ammunition-waggons, and the king returned to the camp at Lignitz.

While he remained in this situation, he received intelligence that twenty-four thousand Russians, under count Czernichew, had formed bridges over the Oder at Auras, where they proposed to pass that river, and he imagined the enemy had conceived a design to close him in, and attack him with their joint forces. Daun had indeed projected a plan for surprising him in the night, and had actually put his army in motion for that purpose; but he was anticipated by the vigilance and good fortune of the Prussian monarch. That prince, reflecting that if he should wait for his adversaries in his camp, he ran the risque of being attacked at the same time by Lacy on his right, by Daun in his front, and by Laudohn on his left, he changed his position, in order to disconcert their operations; operations; and on the fourteenth day of the month proceeded to the Heights of Pfaffendorff, where he drew up his army in order of battle. Being informed, about two in the morning, that Laudohn was in full march, advancing in columns, by Benowitz, he divided his army into two ſeparate bodies. One of theſe continued on the ground, in order to defend the poſt againſt any attempts that might be made by count Daun to aſſiſt Laudohn; and that this ſervice might be the more effectually performed, the Heights were fortified with batteries, ſo judiciouſly diſpoſed as to check and overawe the whole Auſtrian army.

The king having taken this precaution, wheeled about with ſixteen battalions and thirty ſquadrons, to attack Laudohn as he ſhould advance; but that general knew nothing of his deſign, until he himſelf arrived at the village of Pfaffendorff about three in the morning, when the day dawning, and a thick fog gradually diſperſing, the whole detachment of the Pruſſian army appeared in order of battle, in a well choſen ſituation, ſtrengthened with a numerous train of artillery, placed to the beſt advantage. Laudohn was equally mortified and ſurprized to find himſelf caught in his own ſnare; but he had advanced too far to recede, and therefore making a virtue of neceſſity, determined to ſtand an engagement. With this view he formed his troops as well as the time, place, and circumſtances would permit; and the Pruſſians advancing to the attack, a ſevere action enſued. The king rode along the lines to animate the troops, and ſuperintended every part of the charge, hazarding his life in the moſt dangerous ſcenes of the battle to ſuch a degree, that his horſe was killed under him, and his cloaths were ſhot through in ſeveral places. The Auſtrians maintained the conflict with great obſtinacy until ſix in the morning, when they gave way, and were purſued to the Katzbach, beyond which the king would not allow his troops to proſecute the advantage they had gained, that they might be at hand to ſuccour the right, in caſe mareſchal count Daun ſhould ſucceed in his attempt to advance againſt them from Lignitz. That general had actually begun his march to attack the Pruſſians on one ſide, while Laudohn ſhould charge them on the other; but he was not a little ſurpriſed to find they were decamped; and when he perceived a thick cloud of ſmoke at a diſtance, he immediately comprehended the nature of the king's manœuvre. He then endeavoured to advance by Lignitz; but the troops and artillery which had been left on the Height of Pfaffendorff, to oppoſe his march, were ſo advantageouſly poſted as to render all his attempts ineffectual. Laudohn is ſaid to have loſt in the action about eight thouſand men, killed, wounded, and taken, including eighty-four officers, with twenty-three pair of colours, and eighty-two pieces of cannon; and this loſs was greatly increaſed by the deſertion with which it was followed. The Pruſſians obtained the victory at the expence of one general, with five hundred men killed, and twelve hundred wounded. Immediately after the action the king proceeded to Parchwitz; while Daun detached prince Lowenſtein and general Beck, with the reſerve of his army, to join prince Czernichew, who had paſſed the Oder at Auras; but he was ſo thunderſtruck by the defeat at Lignitz, that he forthwith repaſſed the river, and prince Lowenſtein retreated on the ſide of Jauer. By this bold and well-conducted adventure, the Pruſſian monarch not only eſcaped the moſt imminent hazard of a total defeat from the joint efforts of two ſtrong armies, but alſo prevented the dreadful junction of the Ruſſian and Auſtrian forces.

His buſineſs now was to open the communication with Breſlau and his brother prince Henry, whom he joined at Newmarcke. The prince, after Laudohn was compelled to abandon the ſiege of Breſlau, had narrowly watched the motions of the Ruſſian army, which had advanced into the neighbourhood of that city, and without all doubt would have bombarded it from ſome commanding heights, had not they been prevented by prince Henry, who took poſſeſſion of theſe poſts, and fortified them with redoubts. The king having delivered Breſlau from the neighbourhood of his enemies, and being reinforced by his brother's army, left a conſiderable detachment under the command of general Goltze, to ſecure the country againſt the Ruſſian irregulars, and advanced with his whole force to the relief of Schweidnitz, which was blocked up by the Auſtrian army under the command of the mareſchal count Daun. In his march he attacked a ſeparate body under general Beck, made two battalions of Croats priſoners, and diſperſed ſeveral ſquadrons. This atchievement had ſuch an effect upon the enemy, that they raiſed the blockade, and retreated with ſome precipitation to the mountains of Landſhut.

While the king exerted himſelf with ſo much ſpirit and ſucceſs, in the defence of Sileſia, general Hulſen, who commanded his troops in Saxony, was expoſed to the moſt imminent danger. Being informed that the army of the empire had laid a plan for cutting off his communication with Torgau, he inſtantly decamped from Meiſſen, and marched to Strehla. The enemy having divided their forces into two bodies, one of them, on the twentieth day of Auguſt, attacked an advanced poſt of the Pruſſians; while the other was diſpoſed in ſuch a manner as to overawe Hulſen's camp, and prevent him from taking any ſtep for the relief of his battalions, who maintained their ground with difficulty againſt the ſuperior number of the aſſailants. In this emergency the Pruſſian general ordered his cavalry to take a circuit round a riſing ground, and if poſſible attack the enemy in flank. This order was executed with equal vigor and ſucceſs. They ruſhed upon the imperial army with ſuch impetuoſity, as drove their battalions and horſe upon each other in the utmoſt confuſion. A conſiderable number of the enemy were killed, and forty-one officers, with twelve hundred men, made priſoners. By this advantage, which was gained at a very ſmall expence, general Hulſen opened for himſelf a way to Torgau, whither he inſtantly retreated, obſerving that the whole army of the imperialiſts was advancing to cut off his communication with the Elbe; and this retreat furniſhed the enemy with a pretext for claiming the victory.

After all theſe heroic exploits of the Pruſſian monarch and his officers, his affairs continued in ſuch a deſperate ſituation as ſeemed to forebode approaching ruin: for though in perſon he commanded a numerous and gallant army, he found it abſolutely impoſſible to guard againſt the different detachments from the three ſeparate armies of his adverſaries. Bodies of Auſtrian troops ſcoured the country of Luſatia; the Ruſſians traverſed part of Sileſia, and made incurſions even into Brandenburg; the imperial army domineered in Saxony; the Swediſh army meeting with no reſiſtance, advanced into the heart of Pomerania; ſo that the king was not only threatened on every ſide, but all correſpondence between him and his hereditary dominions was at this juncture cut off.

His enemies having been hitherto baffled by his activity and ſpirit, in their deſigns upon Sileſia, now projected a ſcheme, the execution of which he could not but feel in the moſt ſenſible manner. The Ruſſian army being on its retreat from Sileſia, count Czernichew was ſent with a ſtrong detachment into the Marche of Brandenburg, while a numerous body of Auſtrians, under the generals Lacy and Brentano, penetrated into the ſame country from Saxony, with inſtructions to join the Ruſſians at the gates of Berlin. The Pruſſian general Hulſen, finding himſelf unable to cope with the army of the empire in Miſnia, had retired towards this capital, where he was joined by the troops under general Werner, lately returned from Pomerania: but as their forces after this junction did not amount to above fifteen thouſand men, and the allies advancing againſt them conſiſted of no leſs than forty thouſand, they would not pretend to oppoſe the enemy in the open field, nor to defend a city of ſuch extent, and ſo imperfectly fortified. Such an attempt would have not only expoſed their troops to ruin, without being able to ſave the capital; but would have likewiſe ſubjected the place to more ſevere treatment, in conſequence of their oppoſition. They therefore determined to retire, after having repulſed the advanced guard of the Ruſſians under Tottleben, which attacked the gates, and even bombarded the town, before the great armies appeared.

At their approach the Pruſſian generals retreated, leaving three weak battalions in the place, in order to enable it to obtain ſome ſort of conditions from the enemy. Nevertheleſs they made no reſiſtance; but on the firſt ſummons propoſed articles of capitulation, which being rejected, they ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. The foreign miniſters, however, reſiding at Berlin, employed their good offices with ſuch zeal and ſucceſs, that tolerable terms were procured. The inhabitants were indulged with the free exerciſe of their religion, and an immunity from violence to their perſons and effects. The enemy promiſed that the Ruſſian irregulars ſhould not be touched. Theſe articles being ratified, the Auſtrian and Ruſſian troops entered the place, where they totally deſtroyed the magazines, arſenals, and founderies, with an immenſe quantity of military ſtores, and a great number of cannon and ſmall arms: then they demanded the immediate payment of eight hundred thouſand guilders, and afterwards exacted a contribution of one million nine hundred thouſand German crowns. Many outrages were committed by the licentious ſoldiery, in ſpite of all the precautions which the officers could take to preſerve the moſt exact diſcipline. The houſes of the private inhabitants were tolerably ſecured; but the king's palaces were ravaged with the moſt ſhocking barbarity. In the royal palace of Charlottenburg they pillaged and ſpoiled the rich furniture; they defaced and mutilated the valuable pictures and antique ſtatues, collected by cardinal de Polignac, and purchaſed by the family of Brandenburg. The caſtle of Schonhauſen belonging to the queen, and that of Fredericksfeld the property of the margrave Charles, were robbed of effects to an immenſe value. The palace of Potſdam was effectually preſerved by prince Eſterhaſi, who would not ſuffer one article of furniture or ornament to be touched; but deſired leave to take one picture of the king, and two of his German flutes, that he might keep them, he ſaid, as memorials of an illuſtrious prince, whoſe character he admired, whilſt he fought againſt his arms. The Auſtrian and Ruſſian troops entered Berlin on the ninth day of October, and quitted it on the thirteenth, on hearing that the king was advancing with great ſpeed to the relief of his capital. In their retreat, by different routes from Brandenburg, they drove away all the cattle and horſes they could find, ravaged the country, plundered the inhabitants, and committed many brutal outrages, which no pretence of retaliation could juſtify or excuſe.

The body of Ruſſians which entered Berlin, proceeded from thence into Poland, by the way of Furſtenwalde, while the Auſtrians directed their march towards Saxony, from whence they had advanced into Brandenburg. Mean while the town of Wirtemberg, in that electorate, was ſubdued by the duke de Deux Ponts, commander of the imperial army, which, in conjunction with the Auſtrians, reduced likewiſe the towns of Torgau and Leipſic.

The king of Pruſſia, in his way through Luſatia, was ſtill watched by count Daun at the head of his grand army, and both croſſed the Elbe about the latter end of October. His majeſty paſſed the river at Coſwick, where he was joined by the troops under prince Eugene of Wirtemberg and general Hulſen; ſo that his army was now augmented to eighty thouſand fighting men, with whom he determined to ſtrike ſome ſtroke of importance. Indeed he was at this time under a neceſſity of embracing ſome ſuch expedient. General Laudohn, with a conſiderable body of Auſtrians, continued in Sileſia; the Ruſſian army ſtill threatened Breſlau, the capital of that country. The Imperialiſts and Auſtrians had made themſelves maſters of all the great towns in Saxony, and abſolutely commanded on both ſides of the Elbe. In the eaſtern part of Pomerania the Ruſſians had blockaded Colberg by ſea and land, ſeemingly determined to reduce the place, that they might have a ſea-port, by which they could be furniſhed with proviſion, ammunition, neceſſaries, and reinforcements, without the trouble and inconvenience of a long and laborious march from the banks of the Viſtula.

On the weſtern ſide of Pomerania the war, which had hitherto languiſhed, was renewed by the Swedes with uncommon vigour. They croſſed the river Pene without oppoſition; and compelling general Stullerheim to retire, advanced as far as Stranſberg. That officer, however, having received a reinforcement, attacked a Swediſh poſt at Paſſelvalik, killed about five hundred of the enemy, and took an equal number, with ſix pieces of cannon; but he was not ſtrong enough to maintain his ground againſt their whole army.

Thus the Pruſſian monarch ſaw himſelf conſtrained to abandon Sileſia, deprived of all the places he held in Saxony, which had been his beſt reſource; and in danger of being driven into his hereditary country of Brandenburg, which was unable either to ſupport, or even recruit his army.

In this emergency he reſolved to make one deſperate effort againſt the grand Auſtrian army, under count Daun, who had paſſed the Elbe at Torgau, and advanced to Eulenburg, from whence, however, he retreated to his former camp at Torgau, while the king choſe his ſituation between this laſt place and Schilda. His majeſty was fully ſenſible of the ſtrength, the advantageous poſture, and the precautions of mareſchal Daun: he could have no hope of drawing that wary commander from his poſt; and yet he ſaw a neceſſity of fighting him even there. The winter was far advanced. His troops were extremely exhauſted by long and rapid marches; he had no place for their winter-quarters but his own country, already waſted by the enemy's incurſions; and here ſtreightened for ſubſiſtence, cut off from all power of recruiting, he was to expect to be attacked, as it were, in a narrow corner, by the combined force of ſo many powerful and exaſperated enemies.

In theſe circumſtances he was reſolved to come to a battle. He cauſed his army to be informed, that he led them to a moſt deſperate attempt; that his affairs required it; and that he was determined to conquer or die in the enſuing engagement. They unanimouſly anſwered that they would die along with him.

Animated by this declaration, he began his march on the third day of November; and having taken a reſolution as daring as could be dictated by deſpair, he made all the diſpoſitions with as much ſkill and foreſight as could be ſuggeſted by the moſt guarded prudence. He divided his army into three columns. General Hulſen, with one, was to take the poſt that lay on the left of the Auſtrian army, and had orders not to move until he found the reſt of the Pruſſians engaged. General Ziethen was to charge on the right: the great attack in front was to be made by the king in perſon. His majeſty had diſpoſed his force in ſuch a manner, that either his right or left muſt take the enemy in rear, and cloſe them in, ſo as to diſable them from undertaking any thing againſt that part where he intended to effect his principal attack.

M. Daun no ſooner perceived that the king of Pruſſia was ſerious in his reſolution of fighting, than, in order to prevent confuſion, he ſent all his baggage over the Elbe, acroſs which he threw three bridges, to be ready in caſe a retreat ſhould be found neceſſary. At the ſame time he cauſed Torgau to be evacuated; and then extending his left line to a village called Zinne on the left, he ſtretched it to another called Groſwitz on the right, ſupporting the right of his ſecond line upon the Elbe.

In this diſpoſition he was found, when, about two in the afternoon, the king began his attack, and was received with the fire of two hundred pieces of cannon, which were planted along the Auſtrian front. Three times did the Pruſſians advance to the charge with incredible courage and reſolution; and three times were they repulſed and broken with the moſt terrible ſlaughter. The king at length ordered a freſh body of his cavalry to advance, which at firſt compelled the Auſtrians to give way: but as freſh reinforcements were continually poured upon that part, this body was in its turn obliged to fall back; and the battle ſtill remained at leaſt doubtful, if not rather inclined againſt the king of Pruſſia, whoſe troops, as they had made the moſt aſtoniſhing efforts, ſo had they ſuffered beyond all deſcription. But whilſt the Pruſſians ſuſtained themſelves in that quarter with invincible perſeverance, general Ziethen, with the right wing, took the enemy in rear, repulſed them, and poſſeſſed himſelf of ſome eminences, which commanded the whole Auſtrian army. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, the Pruſſian infantry once more advanced, forced ſeveral of the enemy's intrenchments, and made way for a new attack of their cavalry, which broke in with irreſiſtible impetuoſity upon the Auſtrians, and threw ſeveral bodies of them into irreparable diſorder. It was now about nine o'clock; the two armies were involved in pitchy darkneſs; yet the fire continued without intermiſſion, and the battalions, with a blind rage, diſcharged at each other, without diſtinguiſhing friend from foe.

M. Daun did every thing in the diſpoſition and the action that could be expected from his high character; but he was obliged to yield to the miraculous fortune of the king of Pruſſia. He received a dangerous wound in the thigh, and was carried from the field; a circumſtance that, in all probability, diſheartened the troops and haſtened the defeat. The command then fell to the count O'Donnel, who finding a great part of his troops in confuſion, the night advanced, and the enemy poſſeſſed of eminences which commanded his camp, and of which it was in vain to think of diſpoſſeſſing them, ordered a retreat, which was conducted in this darkneſs and acroſs the Elbe with wonderful regularity: none were loſt in paſſing the bridges, and far the greater part of their artillery was preſerved. The Pruſſians remained maſters of this well fought and bloody field. The darkneſs hindered them from moleſting the enemy's retreat, or improving their victory, which they bought at the expence of ten thouſand men killed and wounded, and about fifteen hundred priſoners. But, even with this loſs, the advantage was well purchaſed; it was a neceſſary and a glorious victory; it reeſtabliſhed the reputation of their arms; it ſecured their winter-quarters; and put them once more in poſſeſſion of a great part of Saxony.

Of all the king of Pruſſia's battles this was probably the moſt important; and it was that in the conduct of which he diſcovered the greateſt ſkill, intrepidity, and perſeverance. His troops behaved with a firmneſs which would have done honour to thoſe whom he formerly led into Bohemia. In this action, where they were to ſurmount every obſtacle, and encounter every difficulty and danger in order to attack an army of eighty thouſand Auſtrians, under ſuch an accompliſhed commander as M. Daun, their number did not amount to above fifty thouſand men.

The loſs of the Auſtrians was very great, though the number of killed and wounded was never exactly aſcertained. Probably it did not much, if at all, exceed the loſs on the ſide of the victorious army; but the priſoners were far more numerous; two hundred and ſixteen officers were taken, among whom were four generals, together with eight thouſand of the common men. The king in this battle, in which he every moment expoſed his life to the greateſt dangers, received a ſlight contuſion in his breaſt by a muſket-ſhot.

The Swedes, having advanced a good way into Pomerania, returned again to their winter-quarters at Stralſund; and the Ruſſian generals fell back once more towards the Viſtula: ſo that the confederates gained little elſe in the courſe of this campaign, but the contributions which they levied in Berlin, and the open country of Brandenburg.

The diet of Poland being convoked in the beginning of October, the king confidently expected they would take ſome reſolution in his favour; but the nobles wiſely adhered to their former maxims of a neutrality: and one of the deputies proteſting againſt holding a diet while there were foreign troops in the kingdom, the aſſembly broke up in a tumultuous manner, even before they had choſen a mareſchal.

The diet of Sweden, which met about the ſame period, ſeemed determined to proceed upon buſineſs. They elected count Axel Ferſon their grand mareſchal, in oppoſition to count Horn, by a great majority; which was an unlucky circumſtance for the Pruſſian intereſt at Stockholm, inaſmuch as the ſame majority obſtinately perſiſted in opinion that the war ſhould be carried on in the ſpring with redoubled vigour, and the army in Germany augmented to the number of at leaſt thirty thouſand fighting men.

This unfavourable circumſtance made but little impreſſion upon the Pruſſian monarch, who had maintained his ground with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs ſince the beginning of the campaign, and now enjoyed in proſpect the benefit of winter, which he is ſaid to have termed his beſt auxiliary.

The animoſity which prevailed between the contending parties was not confined to the operations of war; it broke out likewiſe in printed declarations, which the belligerant powers diſperſed all over Europe. In the beginning of the ſeaſon the ſtates of the circle of Weſtphalia had been required by the imperial court to furniſh their contingent of troops againſt the king of Pruſſia, or to commute for this contingent with a ſum of money. In conſequence of this demand, ſome of the Weſtphalian eſtates had ſent deputies to confer with the aſſembly of the circle of Cologne; and to theſe the king ſignified by a declaration dated at Munſter, that as this demand of money, inſtead of troops, was not leſs extraordinary than contrary to the conſtitutions of the empire, ſhould they comply with it, or even continue to aſſiſt his enemies either with troops or money, he would conſider them as having actually taken part in the war againſt him and his allies, and treat them accordingly on all occaſions.

This intimation, however, ſeems to have been but little regarded. The duke of Mecklenbourg adhered to the oppoſite cauſe; and the elector of Cologne co-operated with the French in their deſigns againſt Hanover. By way of retaliation for this partiality, the Pruſſians ravaged the country of Mecklenbourg, and the Hanoverians raiſed contributions in the territories of Cologne. The parties thus aggrieved had recourſe to complaints and remonſtrances. The duke's envoy at Ratiſbon delivered a reſcript to the imperial miniſters, repreſenting, that the Pruſſian troops under general Werner and colonel de Belling had oppreſſed his country in the autumn with grievous extortions; that afterwards prince Eugene of Wirtembourg, in the ſervice of Pruſſia, had demanded an exorbitant quantity of proviſions, with ſome millions of money, and a great number of recruits; or, in lieu of theſe, that the duke's forces ſhould act under the Pruſſian banner. He therefore declared, that as the country of Mecklenbourg was impoveriſhed and almoſt depopulated by theſe oppreſſions, the duke would find himſelf obliged to take meaſures for the future ſecurity of his ſubjects, if not immediately favoured with ſuch aſſiſtance from the court of Vienna as would put a ſtop to thoſe violent proceedings. This declaration was by ſome conſidered as the prelude of his renouncing his engagements with the houſe of Auſtria.

As the imperial court had threatened to put the elector of Hanover under the ban of the empire, on account of the hoſtilities which his troops had committed in the electorate of Cologne, his reſident at Ratiſbon preſented to the miniſters who aſſiſted at the diet, a memorial, importing, that the emperor had no power, ſingly, to ſubject any prince to the ban, or declare him a rebel; and that, by arrogating ſuch a power, he expoſed his authority to the ſame contempt into which the pope's bulls of excommunication were ſo juſtly fallen. With regard to the elector of Cologne, he obſerved, that this prince was the firſt who began hoſtilities, by allowing his troops to act in concert with the French in their invaſions of Hanover, and by celebrating with rejoicings the advantages which they had gained in that electorate: he therefore declared to the ſtates of the empire that the beſt way of protecting their ſubjects from hoſtile treatment, would be a ſtrict obſervation of neutrality in the preſent diſputes of the empire.

This was a ſtrain much more likely to operate upon princes and powers who underſtood and purſued their own intereſt, than was the repetition of complaints, equally pathetic and unavailing, uttered by the unfortunate king of Poland, elector of Saxony. The damage done to his capital by the laſt attempt of the Ruſſians upon that city affected the old king in ſuch a manner, that he publiſhed at Vienna an appeal to all the powers of Europe, againſt the cruel and unprecedented outrages which, he alleged, had been committed by his adverſaries in Saxony. His caſe, it muſt be owned, was truly deplorable; though perhaps, in juſtice, it ought only to be conſidered as the neceſſary conſequence of thoſe dangerous and impolitic engagements which he had originally contracted with the courts of Vienna and Peterſbourg.

With regard to the neutral powers of Europe, they ſtill ſeemed to perſevere in the ſame pacific maxims which they had hitherto purſued. The king of Denmark continued to proſecute thoſe plans which he had ſo wiſely projected for increaſing the wealth, and promoting the happineſs of his ſubjects; nor did he neglect any opportunity of improving natural knowlege, for the benefit of mankind in general. He employed men of ability, at his own expence, to travel into foreign foreign countries, and collect the most curious productions for the advancement of natural history: he encouraged the liberal and mechanic arts at home, by munificent rewards and peculiar protection: he invited above a thousand foreigners from Germany to become his subjects, and settle in certain districts of Jutland, which had lain waste above three centuries; and they forthwith began to build villages, and cultivate the lands in the dioceses of Wibourg, Arhous, and Ripen: their travelling expences from Altena to their new settlement were defrayed by the king, who moreover maintained them until the produce of the lands could afford a comfortable subsistence. He likewise bestowed upon each colonist a house, a barn, and a stable, with a certain number of horses and cattle. Finally, this generous patriot having visited these new subjects, who received him with unspeakable emotions of joy and affection, he ordered a considerable sum of money to be distributed among them, as an additional mark of his favour. Such conduct in a prince cannot fail to secure the warmest returns of loyalty and attachment from his people; and the execution of such laudable schemes will transmit his name with honour to the latest posterity.

The Dutch, as usual, adhered to their old maxims of prosecuting every branch of commerce, unmoved alike by the insinuations of France or the remonstrances of Great Britain. The violation of the peace by their subjects in Bengal was no sooner known to the court of London than orders were sent to general Yorke, the English ambassador at the Hague, to demand an explanation. He accordingly delivered a memorial to the States-general, importing, that their High Mightinesses must doubtless be greatly astonished to hear, by the public papers, of the irregularities committed by their subjects in the East Indies; but, that they would be much more amazed on perusing the piece annexed to his memorial, containing a minute account, specified with the strictest regard to the truth, of the irregular conduct observed by the Dutch towards the British subjects in the river of Bengal, at a time when the factors and traders of Holland enjoyed all the sweets of peace, and all the advantages of unmolested commerce; at a time when his Britannic majesty, from his great regard to their High Mightinesses, carefully avoided giving the least umbrage to the subjects of the United Provinces: that the king his sovereign was deeply affected by these outrageous doings and mischievous designs of the Dutch in the East Indies, whose aim was to destroy the British settlements in that country; an aim that would have been accomplished, had not the king's victorious arms brought them to reason, and obliged them to sue for an accommodation: that his majesty would willingly believe their High Mightinesses had given no order for proceeding to such extremities, and that the directors of their India company had no share in the transaction; nevertheless he (the ambassador) was ordered to demand signal satisfaction in the name of the king his master; that all who should be found to have shared in the offence, so manifestly tending to the destruction of the English settlements in that country, should be exemplarily punished; and that their High Mightinesses should confirm the stipulations agreed upon, immediately after the action, by the directors of the respective companies; in consideration of which agreement, the Dutch ships were restored, after their commanders acknowleged their fault, in owning themselves the aggressors.

To this remonstrance the States-general replied, that nothing of what was laid to the charge of their subjects, had yet reached their knowlege; but they requested his Britannic majesty to suspend his judgment, until he should be made perfectly acquainted with the grounds of those disputes; and they promised he should have reason to be satisfied with the exemplary punishment that would be inflicted upon all who should be found concerned in violating the peace between the two nations. As a proof of their regard for the king of Great Britain, they at length agreed, after warm disputes, to the proposed match between the princess Caroline, sister to the prince of Orange, and the prince of Nassau Weilbourg, in consequence of which the nuptials were celebrated at the Hague, in the month of March with great magnificence.

Notwithstanding the prospect of a rupture in Italy, no new incident disturbed the tranquility of the southern parts of Europe. The king of Spain, though warmly importuned by the other branch of the house of Bourbon to engage in the war as its ally, refused to interpose in any other way than as a mediator between the courts of London and Versailles. He sent the Conde de Fuentes, a nobleman of high rank and character, in quality of ambassador extraordinary to the king of Great Britain, in order to offer his good offices for effecting a peace; and the Conde, after having conferred with the English ministry, made an excursion to Paris; but his proposal with respect to a cessation of hostilities, if in reality such a proposal was ever made, did not meet with a favourable reception. He found no difficulty, however, in compromising some other differences that subsisted between the two crowns of Great Britain and Spain. His Catholic majesty wisely persisted in the execution of that patriotic plan which he had hitherto pursued with so much steadiness. In the first place, he spared no pains and application to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the state of his kingdom. He remitted to his people all they owed the crown, amounting to threescore millions of reals: he demanded an exact account of his father's debts, that they might be discharged with the utmost punctuality: an order was sent to the treasury, that ten millions of reals should be annually appropriated for this purpose, until the whole should be liquidated; and, to the first year's payment, he added fifty millions, to be divided equally among the legal claimants. He took measures for the vigorous execution of the laws against offenders, encouraged industry, protected commerce, and felt the exquisite pleasure of being beloved as the father of his people. To give importance to his crown, and encrease his influence among the powers of Europe, he fitted out a powerful squadron of ships at Carthagena, and is said to have declared his intention to employ them against Algiers, should the dey refuse to release the slaves of the Spanish nation.

The commotion excited in Portugal by the late conspiracy had not yet entirely subsided. The pope's nuncio was not only forbid the court, but even ſent under a ſtrong guard to the frontiers: an indignity which induced the pontiff to order the Portugueſe miniſter at Rome to evacuate the eccleſiaſtical dominions. In the mean time, another embarkation of jeſuits was ſent from Civita Vecchia; yet the expulſion of theſe fathers did not reſtore the internal peace of Portugal, or put an end to the practice of plotting; for, even after their departure, ſome perſons of rank were either committed to cloſe priſon, or exiled from the kingdom. The jeſuits were not more fortunate in America; for in the month of October, in the foregoing year, an obſtinate battle was fought between the united forces of Spain and Portugal, and the Indians of Paraguay, who were under the dominion of the jeſuits: victory at length declared in favour of the two crowns; ſo that the vanquiſhed were obliged to capitulate and lay down their arms. As the court of Portugal had made remonſtrances to the Britiſh miniſtry againſt the proceedings of the Engliſh ſquadron under admiral Boſcawen, which had attacked and deſtroyed ſome French ſhips under the Portugueſe fort in the bay of Lagos, his Britannic majeſty thought proper to ſend the earl of Kinnoul as ambaſſador extraordinary to Liſbon, where that nobleman made ſuch excuſes for the inſult of the Engliſh admiral as entirely removed all miſunderſtanding between the two crowns, and could not fail of being agreeable to the Portugueſe monarch, thus reſpected, ſoothed, and deprecated by a mighty nation in the very zenith of power and proſperity. On the ſixth of June, being the birthday of the king of Portugal, the marriage of his brother Don Pedro with the princeſs of Brazil, was celebrated in the chapel of the palace where the king reſides, to the univerſal joy of the people, as this match will prevent all diſputes with reſpect to the ſucceſſion. The nuptials were announced to the public by the diſcharge of cannon, and celebrated with illuminations, and all kinds of rejoicing.

An incident which happened in the Mediterranean had like to have expoſed the knights of the order of Malta to the reſentment and indignation of the Ottoman Porte. A large Turkiſh ſhip of the line, mounted with ſixty-eight braſs cannon, having on board a complement of ſeven hundred men, beſides ſeventy Chriſtian ſlaves, under the immediate command of the Turkiſh admiral, had, in company with two frigates, five gallies, and other ſmaller veſſels, ſailed in June from the Dardanels, cruiſed along the coaſts of Smyrna, Scio, and Trio, and at length anchored in the channel of Stangie, where the admiral with four hundred perſons went on ſhore, on the ninteenth day of September. The Chriſtian ſlaves ſeizing this opportunity, armed themſelves with knives, and fell upon the three hundred that remained with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that a great number of the Turks were inſtantly ſlain: many leaped over board into the ſea, where they periſhed; and the reſt ſued for mercy. The Chriſtians, having thus ſecured poſſeſſion of the ſhip, hoiſted ſail and bore away for Malta; which, though chaced by the two frigates and a Raguſan ſhip, they reached by crouding all their canvas, and brought their prize ſafe into the harbour of Volette, amidſt the acclamations of the people.

The order of Malta, as a recompence for this ſignal act of bravery and reſolution, aſſigned to the captors the whole property of the ſhip and ſlaves, together with all the effects on board, including a ſum of money, which the Turkiſh commander had collected by contribution, amounting to a million and an half of florins. The grand ſignor was ſo enraged at this event, that he diſgraced his admiral, and threatened to take vengeance on the order of Malta, for having detained the ſhip and countenanced the capture.

Such a dangerous ferment aroſe at Conſtantinople, that a revolution was apprehended. Muſtapha, the preſent emperor, had no ſons; but his brother Bajazet, whoſe life he had ſpared, contrary to the cuſtom of Turkiſh policy, produced a ſon by one of the women with whom he was indulged in his confinement; a circumſtance which arouſed the jealouſy of the emperor to ſuch a degree, that he reſolved to diſpatch his brother. The great officers of the Porte oppoſed this deſign, which was ſo diſagreeable to the people, that an inſurrection enſued. Several Turks and Armenians taking it for granted that a revolution was at hand, bought up great quantities of grain, and a dreadful dearth was the conſequence of this monopoly. The ſultan aſſembled the troops, quieted the inſurgents, ordered the engroſſers of corn to be executed, and in a little time the repoſe of the city was re-eſtabliſhed. Let us now return to the affairs of Great Britain.

Great expectations were formed in England this year from the prodigious increaſe of the navy, which at this juncture amounted to one hundred and twenty ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fireſhips, ſloops, bombs, and tenders. Of theſe capital ſhips ſeventeen were ſtationed in the Eaſt Indies, twenty for the defence of the Weſt Indian iſlands, twelve in North America, ten in the Mediterranean, and ſixty-one, either on the coaſt of France, in the harbours of England, or cruiſing in the Engliſh ſeas for the protection of the Britiſh commerce. Notwithſtanding theſe numerous and powerful armaments, the enemy, who had not a ſhip of the line at ſea, were ſo alert with their ſmall privateers and armed veſſels, that in the beginning of this year, from the firſt of March to the tenth of June they had made prize of two hundred veſſels belonging to Great Britain and Ireland. The whole number of Britiſh ſhips taken by them, from the firſt day of June in the year 1756, to the firſt of June in the preſent year, amounted to two thouſand five hundred and thirty-nine; of theſe ſeventy-eight were privateers, three hundred and twenty-one were retaken, and about the ſame number ranſomed. In the ſame ſpace of time the Britiſh cruizers had made captures of nine hundred forty-four veſſels, including two hundred forty-two privateers, many fiſhing boats and ſmall coaſters; the acquiſition of which was not of ſo great conſequence by their intrinſic value, as by depriving the enemy of an additional number of their ſailors. That ſuch a ſmall proportion of ſhips ſhould be taken from the French during this period will not appear ſurpriſing, when we conſider the terrible ſhock their commerce had antecedently ſuſtained, and the great number of their mariners that were previouſly impriſoned in England, and who by this time amounted to little leſs than twenty thouſand.

The preſent year, it muſt be owned, was not ſo fruitful in naval events as the former: nevertheleſs it was diſtinguiſhed by ſome gallant exploits, which reflected great honour on our ſea commanders. I have, in recording the tranſactions of the preceding year, mentioned a ſmall armament equipped at Dunkirk, under the command of M. de Thurot, who, in ſpite of all the vigilance of the Britiſh commander ſtationed in the Downs, found means to eſcape from the harbour in the month of October laſt, and arrived at Gottenburgh in Sweden, from whence he proceeded to Bergen in Norway. His inſtructions were to make occaſional deſcents upon the coaſt of Ireland, and by dividing the troops, and diſtracting the attention of the government in that kingdom, to facilitate the enterprize of M. de Conflans, the fate of which I have already narrated. The original armament of Thurot conſiſted of five ſhips, one of which, called the Mareſchal Belleiſle, was mounted with forty-four guns; the Begon, the Blond, the Terpſichore, had thirty guns each, and the Marante carried twenty-four. The number of ſoldiers put on board this little fleet did not exceed one thouſand two hundred and ſeventy, excluſive of mariners, to the number of ſeven hundred; beſides two hundred of the troops were ſent ſick on ſhore, before the armament ſailed from Dunkirk; and in their voyage between Gottenburgh and Bergen they loſt company of the Begon, during a violent ſtorm. The ſeverity of the weather detained them nineteen days at Bergen, at the expiration of which they ſet ſail for the northern part of Ireland in the latter end of January.

The intention of Thurot was to make a deſcent about Derry; but before this deſign could be executed, the weather growing tempeſtuous, and the wind blowing off ſhore, they were driven out to ſea, and in the night loſt ſight of the Marante, which never joined them in the ſequel. After having been tempeſt beaten for ſome time, and expoſed to a very ſcanty allowance of proviſion, the officers requeſted of Thurot that he would return to France, leſt they ſhould all periſh by famine; but he lent a deaf ear to their propoſal, and frankly told them he could not return to France without having ſtruck ſome ſtroke for the ſervice of his country. Nevertheleſs, in hope of meeting with ſome refreſhment, he ſteered to the iſland of Iſla, where the troops were landed; and here they found black cattle and a ſmall ſupply of oatmeal, for which they paid a reaſonable price; and it muſt be owned Thurot himſelf behaved with great moderation and generoſity.

While this gallant adventurer ſtruggled with theſe numerous difficulties, his arrival in the Britiſh ſeas filled the whole kingdom with alarm. Bodies of regular troops and militia were poſted along the coaſts of Ireland and Scotland; and beſides the ſquadron of commodore Boys, who ſailed to the northward on purpoſe to purſue the enemy, other ſhips of war were ordered to ſcour the Briſtol Channel, and cruize between Scotland and Ireland. The weather no ſooner permitted Thurot to purſue his deſtination, than he ſailed from Iſla to the bay of Carrickfergus in Ireland, and made all the neceſſary preparations for a deſcent, which was accordingly effected, with ſix hundred men, on the twenty-firſt day of February. Lieutenant-colonel Jennings, who commanded four companies of raw undiſciplined men at Carrickfergus, having received information that three ſhips had anchored about two miles and a half from the caſtle, which was ruinous and defenceleſs, immediately detached a party to make obſervations, and ordered the French priſoners there confined to be removed to Belfaſt.

Mean while the enemy landing without oppoſition, advanced towards the town, which they found as well guarded as the nature of the place (which was entirely open) and the circumſtances of the Engliſh commander would admit. A regular attack was carried on, and a ſpirited defence made, until the ammunition of the Engliſh failed; then colonel Jennings retired in order to the caſtle, which however was in all reſpects untenable; for, beſides a breach in the wall near fifty feet wide, they found themſelves deſtitute of proviſion and ammunition. Nevertheleſs, they repulſed the aſſailants in their firſt attack, even after the gate was burſt open, and ſupplied the want of ſhot with ſtones and rubbiſh. At length, the colonel and his troops were obliged to ſurrender, on condition that they ſhould not be ſent priſoners to France, but be ranſomed by ſending thither an equal number of French priſoners from Great Britain or Ireland; that the caſtle ſhould not be demoliſhed, nor the town of Carrickfergus plundered or burned, on condition that the mayor and corporation ſhould furniſh the French troops with neceſſary proviſions.

The enemy, after this exploit, did not venture to advance farther into the country; a ſtep which indeed they could not have taken with any regard to their own ſafety; for by this time a conſiderable body of regular troops was collected, and the people of the country manifeſted a laudable ſpirit of loyalty and reſolution, crowding in great numbers to Belfaſt, to offer their ſervice againſt the invaders. Theſe circumſtances, of which the enemy were fully apprized, and the defeat of Conflans, which they had alſo learned, obliged them to abandon their conqueſt, and reimbark with ſome precipitation, after having laid Carrickfergus under moderate contribution.

The fate they eſcaped on ſhore they ſoon met with at ſea. Captain John Elliot, who commanded three frigates at Kinſale, and had, in the courſe of this war, already ſignalized himſelf by extraordinary acts of valour, was informed by a diſpatch from the duke of Bedford, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, that three of the enemy's ſhips lay at anchor in the bay of Carrickfergus, and thither he immediately ſteered his courſe in the ſhip Æolus, accompanied by the Pallas and Brilliant, under the command of the captains Clements and Logie. On the twenty-eighth day of February they diſcovered the enemy, and gave chace, in ſight of the Iſle of Man; and about nine in the morning captain Elliot, in his own ſhip, attacked the Belleiſle, commanded by Thurot, although conſiderably his ſuperior in ſtrength of men, number of guns, and weight of metal. In a few minutes his conſorts were alſo engaged with the other two ſhips of the enemy. After a warm action maintained with great ſpirit on all ſides for an hour and a half, captain Elliot's lieutenant boarded the Belleiſle, and, ſtriking her colours with his own hand, the commander ſubmitted. His example was immediately followed by the other French captains; and the Engliſh commodore taking poſſeſſion of his prizes, conveyed them to the Iſle of Man that their damage might be repaired.

Though the Belleiſle was very leaky, and had loſt her boltſprit, mizen-maſt, and main-yard, in all probability the victory would not have been ſo eaſily purchaſed, had not the gallant Thurot fallen during the action. The victor had not even the conſolation to perform the laſt offices to his brave enemy; for his body was thrown into the ſea by his own people in the hurry of the engagement. The loſs on the ſide of the Engliſh did not exceed forty men killed and wounded; whereas three hundred of the enemy were ſlain or diſabled.

The ſervice performed on this occaſion was deemed ſo eſſential to the peace and commerce of Ireland, that the thanks of the houſe of commons in that kingdom were voted to the conquerors of Thurot, as well as to lieutenant-colonel Jennings, for his ſpirited behaviour at Carrickfergus: and the freedom of the city of Cork was preſented in ſilver boxes to the captains Elliot, Clements, and Logie. The name of Thurot was become terrible to all the trading ſea-ports of Britain and Ireland; and therefore the defeat and capture of his ſquadron were celebrated with as hearty rejoicings as could have been produced by the moſt important victory.

In the beginning of April another engagement between four frigates, ſtill more equally matched, had a different iſſue, though not leſs honourable to the Britiſh commanders. Captain Skinner of the Biddeford, and captain Kennedy of the Flamborough, both frigates, ſailed on a cruize from Liſbon, and on the fourth day of April came up with two large French frigates, convoy to a fleet of merchant ſhips, which the Engliſh captains immediately reſolved to attack. The enemy did not decline the engagement, which began about half an hour after ſix in the evening, and was continued with great fury till eleven. By this time the Flamborough had loſt ſight of the Biddeford, and the frigate with which captain Kennedy was engaged bore away with all the ſail ſhe could carry. He purſued her till noon the next day, when ſhe had left him ſo far aſtern, that he loſt ſight of her, and returned to Liſbon with the loſs of fifteen men killed and wounded, including the lieutenant of marines, and conſiderable damage in her hull and rigging. In three days he was joined by the Biddeford, which had alſo compelled her antagoniſt to give way, and purſued her till ſhe was out of ſight. In about an hour after the action began, captain Skinner was killed by a cannon-ball; and the command devolved to lieutenant Knollis, ſon to the earl of Banbury †, who maintained the battle with great ſpirit, even after he was wounded, until he received a ſecond ſhot in his body, which proved mortal. Then the maſter aſſuming the direction, continued the engagement with equal reſolution, until the enemy made his eſcape, which he the more eaſily accompliſhed, as the Biddeford was diſabled in her maſts and rigging.

No action of importance was in the courſe of this year performed by the naval forces of Great Britain in the ſeas of Europe. A powerful ſquadron ſtill remained in the bay of Quiberon, in order to amuſe and employ a body of French forces on that part of the coaſt, interrupt the navigation of the enemy, and at the ſame time to watch the motions of thoſe few French ſhips which had run into the river Villaine, after the defeat of Conflans. The fleet employed on this ſervice was alternately commanded by admiral Boſcawen and ſir Edward Hawke; the former of whom took poſſeſſion of a ſmall iſland near the river Vannes, which he cauſed to be cultivated and planted with vegetables for the uſe of the men infected with ſcorbutic diſorders, ariſing from ſalt proviſions, ſea air, and want of proper exerciſe. In the month of September ſir Edward Hawke, who had by this time relieved Mr. Boſcawen, detached the gallant lord Howe in the Magnanime, with the ſhips Prince Frederick and Bedford, to reduce the little iſland of Dumet, about three miles in length and two in breadth, abounding with freſh water. It was defended by a ſmall fort mounted with nine cannon, and garriſoned by one company of the regiment of Bourbon, who ſurrendered in a very ſhort time after the ſhips had begun the attack. By this ſmall conqueſt a conſiderable expence was ſaved to the nation in the article of tranſports employed to carry water for the uſe of the ſquadron.

Admiral Rodney ſtill maintained his former ſtation off the harbour of Havre de Grace, in order to overawe the enemy on that part of the coaſt. In the month of July, while he hovered in this neighbourhood, five large flat-bottomed boats, loaded with cannon and ſhot, ſet ſail from Harfleur in the middle of the day, with their colours flying, as if they had ſet the Engliſh ſquadron at defiance; for the walls of Havre de Grace, and even the adjacent hills, were lined with ſpectators, aſſembled to behold the iſſue of this adventure. Having reached the river of Caen, they ſtood backwards and forwards upon the ſhoals, intending to amuſe Mr. Rodney till night, and then proceed under the cover of darkneſs. He perceived their drift, and gave directions to his ſmall veſſels to be ready, that as ſoon as day-light failed, they ſhould make all the ſail they could for the mouth of the river Orne, with a view to cut off the enemy's retreat, while he himſelf ſtood in with the larger ſhips to the ſteep coaſt of Port Braſſin. The ſcheme ſucceeded to his wiſh. The enemy ſeeing their retreat cut off, ran aſhore at Port Braſſin, where the admiral deſtroyed them, together with the ſmall fort which had been erected for the defence of the harbour. Each of thoſe veſſels was one hundred feet in length, capable of containing four hundred men for a ſhort paſſage. What their deſtination was, we cannot pretend to determine: but the French had provided a great number of theſe tranſports; for ten eſcaped into the river Orne leading to Caen; and in conſequence of this diſaſter, one hundred were unloaded and ſent up again to Rouen.

† Five ſons of this nobleman diſtinguiſhed themſelves remarkably in the courſe of this war. The fourth and fifth were dangerouſly wounded at the battle of Minden; the ſecond was hurt in the reduction of Guadalupe: lord Wallingford, the eldeſt, received a ſhot at Carrickfergus: and the third was ſlain in this engagement.

Nor was this the only damage which the enemy ſuffered on this part of their coaſt. In the month of November captain Ourry, of the Acteon, chaced a large privateer, and drove her on ſhore between Cape Barfleur and La Hogue, where ſhe periſhed. The cutters belonging to Mr. Rodney's ſquadron ſcoured the coaſt towards Dieppe, where a conſiderable fiſhery was carried on, and where they took or deſtroyed near forty veſſels of conſiderable burthen. Though the Engliſh navy ſuffered nothing from the French during this period, it ſuſtained ſome damage from the weather. The Conqueror, a new ſhip of the line, was loſt in the Channel on the iſland of St. Nicholas; but the crew and cannon were ſaved. The Lyme, of twenty guns, foundered in the Cattegate in Norway, and fifty of the men periſhed; and in the Weſt Indies a tender belonging to the Dublin, commanded by commodore ſir James Douglas, was loſt in a gale of wind, with an hundred choſen mariners.

Of the domeſtic tranſactions relating to the war, the moſt important was the fitting out a powerful armament deſtined for ſome ſecret expedition. A numerous body of forces was aſſembled, and a great number of tranſports collected at Portſmouth. Generals were nominated to the command of this enterprize. The troops were actually embarked, with a great train of artillery; and the eyes of the whole nation were attentively fixed upon this armament, which could not have been prepared without incurring a very conſiderable expence. Notwithſtanding theſe preparations, no enterprize of importance was undertaken; and in the latter end of the year the expedition was wholly laid aſide. The people did not fail to clamour againſt the inactivity of the ſummer; and it muſt be owned their complaints were not entirely without foundation: but in all probability the deſign of the armament was either to intimidate the French into propoſals of peace, to make a diverſion from the Rhine, by alarming the coaſt of Bretagne, or to throw over a body of troops into Flanders, to effect a junction with the hereditary prince of Brunſwic, who, at the head of twenty thouſand men, had made an irruption as far as the Lower Rhine, and even croſſed that river.

The only conſiderable damage ſuſtained by the navy of Great Britain ſince the commencement of this year, was the loſs of the Ramillies, a magnificent ſhip of the ſecond rate, belonging to the ſquadron which admiral Boſcawen commanded on the coaſt of France, in order to watch the motions and diſtreſs the commerce of that reſtleſs enterpriſing enemy. In the beginning of February a ſeries of ſtormy weather obliged the admiral to return from the bay of Quiberon to Plymouth, where he arrived with much difficulty; but the Ramillies overſhot the entrance to the Sound, and being embayed near a point called the Bolt-head, about four leagues higher up the Channel, was daſhed in pieces among the rocks, after all her anchors and cables had given way. All her officers and men, amounting to ſeven hundred, periſhed on this occaſion, except one midſhipman and twenty-five mariners, who had the good fortune to ſave themſelves by leaping on the rocks, as the hull was thrown forwards, and raiſed up by the ſucceeding billows.

Having thus given a circumſtantial account of the moſt remarkable events that happened in the Britiſh dominions and the European ſeas in the courſe of this ſummer, we muſt now turn our eyes to the continent of North America, which, as the theatre of war, ſtill maintained its former importance. The French emiſſaries from the province of Louiſiana had exerciſed their arts of inſinuation with ſuch ſucceſs among the Cherokees, a numerous and powerful nation of the Indians, ſettled on the confines of Virginia and Carolina, that they had infringed the peace with the Engliſh towards the latter end of the laſt year, and begun hoſtilities by plundering, maſſacring, and ſcalping ſeveral Britiſh ſubjects of the more ſouthern provinces. Mr. Lyttleton, governor of South Carolina, having received information of theſe outrages, obtained the neceſſary aids from the aſſembly of his province, for maintaining a conſiderable body of forces, which was raiſed with great expedition. He marched in the beginning of October at the head of eight hundred provincials, reinforced with three hundred regular troops, and penetrated into the heart of the country poſſeſſed by the Cherokees, who were ſo much intimidated by his vigour and diſpatch, that they ſent a deputation of their chiefs to ſue for peace, which was re-eſtabliſhed by a new treaty, dictated by the Engliſh governor. They obliged themſelves to renounce the French intereſt; to deliver up all the ſpies and emiſſaries of that nation, then reſident among them; to ſurrender to juſtice thoſe of their own people who had been concerned in murdering and ſcalping the Britiſh ſubjects; and for the performance of theſe articles two and twenty of their head men were put as hoſtages into the hands of the governor.

So entirely regardleſs, however, were theſe treacherous barbarians of this ſolemn accommodation, that Mr. Lyttleton had hardly returned from their country, when they attempted to ſurprize the Engliſh fort at Prince George, near the frontiers of Carolina, by going thither in a body, on pretence of delivering up ſome murderers. This attempt was conducted in the following manner, having doubtleſs been concerted with the two and twenty hoſtages who reſided in the fort. On the ſixteenth day of February two Indian women appearing at Keowee, on the other ſide of the river, Mr. Dogharty, one of the officers of the fort, went out to aſk them what news. While he was engaged in converſation with theſe females, the great Indian warrior Ouconnoſtata joining them, deſired he would call the commanding officer, to whom he ſaid he had ſomething to propoſe. Accordingly, lieutenant Cotymore appearing, accompanied by enſign Bell, Dogharty, and Forſter the interpreter, Ouconnoſtata told him he had ſomething of conſequence to impart to the governor, whom he purpoſed to viſit, and deſired he might be attended by a white man as a ſafeguard. The lieutenant aſſuring him he ſhould have a ſafeguard, the Indian declared he would then go and catch a horſe for him; ſo ſaying, he ſwung a bridle thrice over his head as a ſignal, and immediately twenty-five or thirty muſkets, from different ambuſcades, were diſcharged at the Engliſh officers. Mr. Cotymore received a ſhot in his left breaſt, and in a few days expired; Mr. Bell was wounded in the calf of the leg, and the interpreter in the buttock.

Enſign Milne, who remained in the fort, was no ſooner informed of this treachery than he ordered the ſoldiers to ſhackle the hoſtages; in the execution of which order one man was killed on the ſpot, and another wounded in the forehead with a tomohawk: circumſtances which, added to the murder of the lieutenant, incenſed the garriſon to ſuch a degree, that it was judged abſolutely neceſſary to put the hoſtages to death without farther heſitation. In the evening a party of Indians approaching the fort, and firing two ſignal-pieces, cried aloud in the Cherokee language, "Fight manfully, and you ſhall be aſſiſted." Then they began an attack, and continued firing all night upon the fort, without doing the leaſt execution.

That a deſign was concerted between them and the hoſtages, appeared plainly from the nature of this aſſault; and this ſuppoſition was converted into a certainty next day, when ſome of the garriſon ſearching the apartment in which the hoſtages lay, found a bottle of poiſon, probably deſigned to be emptied into the well, and ſeveral tomohawks buried in the earth; which weapons had been privately conveyed to them by their friends, who were permitted to viſit them without interruption. On the third day of March the fort at Ninety-Six was attacked by two hundred Cherokee Indians, with muſquetry, which had little or no effect; ſo that they were forced to retire with ſome loſs, and revenged themſelves on the open country, burning and ravaging all the houſes and plantations belonging to the Engliſh ſettlers in this part of the country, and all along the frontiers of Virginia. Not contented with pillaging and deſtroying the habitations, they wantoned in the moſt horrible barbarities; and their motions were ſo ſecret and ſudden, that it was impoſſible for the inhabitants to know where the ſtorm would burſt, or take proper precautions for their own defence, ſo that a great number of the back ſettlements were totally abandoned.

The Indians, diſappointed in their deſign upon Fort Prince George, wreaked their vengeance upon the Engliſh ſubjects trading in their country, all of whom they butchered without mercy. Not contented with this barbarous ſacrifice, they made incurſions into the Britiſh ſettlements at the Long Lanes, and the forks of the Broad River, and maſſacred about forty defenceleſs coloniſts, who repoſed themſelves in full ſecurity on the peace ſo lately ratified. As views of intereſt could not have induced them to act in this manner, and their revenge had not been inflamed by any freſh provocation, theſe violences were naturally imputed to the inſtigation of French incendiaries; and too plainly evinced the neceſſity of crowning our American conqueſts with the reduction of Louiſiana, from whence theſe emiſſaries were undoubtedly diſpatched.

The horrible cruelties which the Cherokees committed upon their renewal of hoſtilities, alarmed all the ſouthern colonies of the Engliſh; and application was made for aſſiſtance to Mr. Amherſt, the commander in chief of the king's forces in America. He forthwith detached twelve hundred choſen men to South Carolina, under the command of colonel Montgomery, brother to the earl of Eglinton, an officer of approved conduct and diſtinguiſhed gallantry. Immediately after his arrival at Charles Town, he advanced to Ninety-Six, and proceeded to Twelve Mile River, which he paſſed in the beginning of June without oppoſition. He proſecuted his route by forced marches, until he arrived in the neighbourhood of the Indian town called Keowee, where he encamped in an advantageous ſituation. Having reaſon to believe the enemy were not yet appriſed of his coming, he reſolved to ruſh upon them in the night by ſurprize.

With this view, leaving his tents ſtanding, with a ſufficient guard for the camp and waggons, he marched through the woods towards the Cherokee town of Eſtatoe, at the diſtance of twenty-five miles, and in his route detached a company of light infantry to deſtroy the village of Little Keowee, where they were received with a ſmart fire; but they ruſhed in with their bayonets, and all the men were put to the ſword. The main body proceeded ſtraight to Eſtatoe, which they reached in the morning; but it had been abandoned about half an hour before their arrival. Some few of the Indians who had not time to eſcape were ſlain; and the town, conſiſting of two hundred houſes, well ſtored with proviſion, ammunition, and all the neceſſaries of life, was firſt plundered, and then reduced to aſhes; ſome of the wretched inhabitants who concealed themſelves periſhing in the flames. It was neceſſary to ſtrike a terror into thoſe ſavages by ſome examples of ſeverity; and the ſoldiers became deaf to all the ſuggeſtions of mercy, when they found in one of the Indian towns the body of an Engliſhman, whom they had put to the torture that very morning.

Colonel Montgomery followed his blow with ſurpriſing rapidity. In the ſpace of a few hours he deſtroyed Sugar Town, which was as large as Eſtatoe, and every village and houſe in the lower nation. The Indian villages in this part of the world were agreeably ſituated, generally conſiſting of about one hundred houſes, neatly and commodiouſly built, and well ſupplied with proviſion. They had in particular large magazines of corn, which were conſumed in the flames. All the men that were taken ſuffered immediate death; but the greater part of the nation had eſcaped with the utmoſt precipitation. In many houſes the beds were yet warm, and the tables ſpread with victuals. Many loaded guns went off while the houſes were burning. The ſavages had not time to ſave their moſt valuable effects. The ſoldiers found ſome money, three or four watches, a good quantity of wampum, cloaths, and peltry.

Colonel Montgomery, having thus taken vengeance on the perfidious Cherokees, at the expence of five or ſix men killed or wounded, returned to fort Prince George, with about forty Indian women and children whom he had made priſoners. Two of their warriors were ſet at liberty, and deſired to inform their nation, that though they were now in the power of the Engliſh, they might ſtill, on their ſubmiſſion, enjoy the bleſſing of peace. As the chief, callled Attakullakulla, alias the Little Carpenter, who had ſigned the laſt treaty, diſapproved of the proceedings of his countrymen, and had done many good offices to the Engliſh, ſince the renovation of the war, he was now given to underſtand, that he might come down with ſome other chiefs to treat of an accommodation, which would be granted to the Cherokees on his account; but that the negociation muſt be begun in a few days, otherwiſe all the towns in the upper nation would be ravaged and reduced to aſhes.

Theſe intimations having produced little or no effect, colonel Montgomery determined to make a ſecond irruption into the middle ſettlements of the Cherokees, and began his march on the twenty-fourth day of June. On the twenty-ſeventh, captain Moriſon, of the advanced party, was killed by a ſhot from a thicket, and the firing became ſo troubleſome that his men gave way. The grenadiers and light infantry detached to ſuſtain them, continued to advance notwithſtanding their fire from the woods, until from a riſing ground they diſcovered a body of the enemy. Theſe they immediately attacked, and obliged to retire into a ſwamp, which, when the reſt of the troops came up, they were, after a ſhort reſiſtance, compelled to abandon: but as the country was difficult, and the path extremely narrow, the forces ſuffered on their march from the fire of ſcattered parties, who concealed themſelves behind trees and buſhes.

At length they arrived at the town of Etchowee, which the inhabitants had forſaken, after having removed every thing of value. Here, while the army encamped on a ſmall plain ſurrounded by hills, it was incommoded by vollies from the enemy, which wounded ſome men, and killed ſeveral horſes. They were even ſo daring as to attack the piquet guard, which repulſed them with difficulty; but, generally ſpeaking, their parties declined an open engagement. Colonel Montgomery ſenſible, that as many horſes were killed or diſabled, he could not proceed farther without leaving his proviſions behind, or abandoning the wounded men to the brutal revenge of a ſavage enemy, reſolved to return, and began his march in the night, that he might be the leſs diſturbed by the Indians. Accordingly he purſued his route for two days without interruption; but afterwards ſuſtained ſome ſtraggling fires from the woods, though the parties of the enemy were put to flight as often as they appeared. In the beginning of July he arrived at Fort Prince George; this expedition having coſt him about ſeventy men killed and wounded, including five officers.

The Cherokees, rather provoked than intimidated by this ſevere chaſtiſement, aſſembled to a conſiderable number, and formed the blockade of Fort Loudoun, a ſmall fortification near the confines of Virginia, defended by an inconſiderable garriſon, ill ſupplied with proviſion and neceſſaries. After having ſuſtained a long ſiege, and being reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs, captain Demere, the commander, held a council of war with the other officers, to deliberate upon their preſent ſituation; when it appeared that their proviſions were intirely exhauſted: that they had ſubſiſted a conſiderable time, without bread, upon horſe-fleſh, and ſuch ſupplies of pork and beans as the Indian women could introduce by ſtealth: that the men were ſo weakened with famine and fatigue, that in a little time they would not be able to do duty: that for two nights paſt, conſiderable parties had deſerted, and ſome thrown themſelves upon the mercy of the enemy: that the garriſon in general threatened to abandon their officers, and betake themſelves to the woods: and that there was no proſpect of relief, their communication having been long cut off from all the Britiſh ſettlements. For theſe reaſons they were unanimouſly of opinion, that it was impracticable to prolong their defence; that they ſhould accept of an honourable capitulation; and that captain Stuart ſhould be ſent to treat with the warriors, and the head men of the Cherokees, about the conditions of their ſurrender. This officer, being accordingly diſpatched with full powers, obtained a capitulation of the Indians, by which the garriſon was permitted to retire. The Indians requeſted, that, when they arrived at Keowee, the Cherokee priſoners confined at that place ſhould be releaſed, all hoſtilities ceaſe, a laſting accommodation be re-eſtabliſhed, and a regular trade revived. In conſequence of this treaty the garriſon evacuated the fort, and had marched about fifteen miles on their return to Carolina, when they were ſurrounded and ſurpriſed by a large body of Indians, who maſſacred all the officers, except captain Stuart, and ſlew five-and-twenty of the ſoldiers: the reſt were made priſoners, and diſtributed among the different towns and villages of the nation. Captain Stuart owed his life to the generous interceſſion of the Little Carpenter, who ranſomed him at the price of all he could command, and conducted him ſafe to Holſton River, where he found major Lewes advanced ſo far with a body of Virginians.

In the mean time the Britiſh intereſt and empire were firmly eſtabliſhed on the banks of the Ohio, by the prudent conduct of major-general Stanwix, who had paſſed the winter at Pittſburgh, formerly Duqueſne, and employed that time in the moſt effectual manner for the ſervice of his country. He repaired the fortifications of the place, eſtabliſhed poſts of communication from the Ohio to the Monongahela, mounted the baſtions that cover the iſthmus with artillery, erected caſemates, ſtorehouſes, and barracks for a numerous garriſon, and cultivated with equal diligence and ſucceſs the friendſhip and alliance of the Indians. The happy conſequences of theſe meaſures were ſoon apparent in the production of a conſiderable trade between the natives and the merchants of Pittſburgh, and in the perfect ſecurity of about four thouſand ſettlers, who now returned to the quiet poſſeſſion of the lands, from whence they had been driven by the enemy, on the frontiers of Penſylvania, Maryland, and Virginia.

The ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms was ſtill more remarkable in the northern parts of this great continent. I have already obſerved, that brigadier general Murray was left to command the garriſon of Quebec, amounting to about ſix thouſand men; that a ſtrong ſquadron of ſhips was ſtationed at Halifax in Nova Scotia, under the direction of lord Colvil, an able and experienced officer, who had inſtructions to reviſit Quebec in the beginning of ſummer, as ſoon as the river St. Laurence ſhould be navigable; and that general Amherſt, the commander in chief of the forces in America, wintered in New York, that he might be at hand to aſſemble his troops in the ſpring, and recommence his operations for the entire reduction of Canada.

General Murray neglected no ſtep that could be taken by the moſt vigilant officer for maintaining the important conqueſt of Quebec, and ſubduing all the Lower Canada. He repaired, during the winter, about five hundred houſes which had been damaged by the Engliſh cannon, built eight redoubts of wood, raiſed foot-banks along the ramparts, opened embrazures, mounted artillery, blocked up all the avenues of the ſuburbs with a ſtockade, removed eleven months proviſions into the higheſt part of the city, and formed a magazine of four thouſand faſcines. Two hundred men were poſted at St. Foix, and twice the number at Lorette. Several hundred men marched to St. Auguſtin, brought off the enemy's advanced guard, with a great number of cattle, and diſarmed the inhabitants. By theſe precautions the motions of the French were obſerved, the avenues of Quebec were covered, and the Britiſh dominion ſecured over eleven pariſhes, which furniſhed them with ſome freſh proviſion and other neceſſaries for ſubſiſtence. Sixteen thouſand cords of wood being wanted for the hoſpitals, guards, and quarters, and the method of tranſporting it from the iſle of Orleans being found ſlow and difficult, on account of the floating ice in the river, a ſufficient number of hand ſledges was made, and two hundred woodfellers ſet at work in the foreſt of St. Foix, where plenty of fuel was obtained, and brought into the ſeveral regiments by the men that were not upon duty. A detachment of two hundred men being ſent to the other ſide of the river, diſarmed the inhabitants, and compelled them to take the oath of allegiance. By this ſtep the Engliſh became maſters of the ſouthern ſide of the river St. Laurence, and were ſupplied with good quantities of freſh proviſion.

The advanced poſts of the enemy were eſtabliſhed at Point Au Tremble, St. Auguſtin, and Le Calvaire: the main body of their army quartered between Trois Rivieres and Jaques Quartier. Their general having formed the deſign of attacking Quebec in the winter, began to provide ſnow ſhoes or rackets, ſcaling-ladders, and faſcines, and make all the neceſſary preparations for that enterprize. He took poſſeſſion of Point Levi, where he formed a magazine of proviſions, great part of which, however, fell into the hands of the Engliſh; for as ſoon as the river was froze over, brigadier Murray diſpatched thither two hundred men, at whoſe approach the enemy abandoned their magazine, and retreated with great precipitation. Here the detachment took poſt in a church, until they could build two wooden redoubts, and mount them with artillery. In the mean time, the enemy returning with a greater force to recover the poſt, ſome battalions, with the light infantry, marched over the ice, in order to cut off their communication: but they fled in great confuſion, and afterwards took poſt at St. Michael, at a conſiderable diſtance farther down the river. They now reſolved to poſtpone the ſiege of Quebec, that they might carry it on in a more regular manner. They began to rigg their ſhips, repair their ſmall craft, build gallies, caſt bombs and bullets, and prepare faſcines and gabions; while brigadier Murray employed his men in making preparations for a vigorous defence. He ſent out a detachment, who ſurpriſed the enemy's poſts at St. Auguſtin, Maiſon Brulee, and Le Calvaire, where they took ninety priſoners. He afterwards ordered the light infantry to poſſeſs and fortify Cape Rouge, to prevent the enemy's landing at that place, as well as to be nearer at hand to obſerve their motions; but when the froſt broke up, ſo that their ſhips could fall down the river, they landed at St. Auguſtin, and the Engliſh poſts were abandoned one after another, the detachments retiring without loſs into the city.

Mean while the garriſon within the walls of Quebec ſuffered greatly from the exceſſive cold in the winter, and the want of vegetables and freſh proviſion, inſomuch that, before the end of April, one thouſand ſoldiers were dead of the ſcurvy, and twice that number rendered unfit for ſervice. Such was the ſituation of the garriſon, when Mr. Murray received undoubted intelligence that the French commander, the chevalier de Levy, was employed in aſſembling his army, which had been cantoned in the neighbourhood of Montreal; that from the inhabitants of the country he had completed his eight battalions, regimented forty companies of the coloniſts, and determined to undertake the ſiege of Quebec, whenever the river St. Laurence ſhould be ſo clear of ice that he could uſe his four frigates, and other veſſels, by means of which he would be entirely maſter of the river.

The brigadier, perceiving that the city of Quebec was no other than a ſtrong cantonment, had projected a plan of defence, by extending lines, and intrenching his troops on the Heights of Abraham, which, at the diſtance of eight hundred paces, entirely command the ramparts of the city, and might have been defended by a ſmall force againſt a formidable army. Faſcines, and every other neceſſary for this work, had been provided, and in the month of April the men were ſet at work upon the projected lines; but the earth was ſo hardened by the froſt, that it was found impracticable to proceed. Being informed, on the night of the twenty-ſixth, that the enemy had landed at Point au Tremble, to the number of ten thouſand men, with five hundred ſavages, he ordered all the bridges over the river Caprouge to be broke down, ſecured the landing-places at Sylleri and the Foulon; and next day, marching in perſon with a ſtrong detachment and two field-pieces, took poſſeſſion of an advantageous ſituation, and thus defeated the ſcheme which the French commander had laid for cutting off the poſts which the Engliſh had eſtabliſhed. Theſe being all withdrawn, the brigadier that ſame afternoon marched back to Quebec with little or no loſs, although his rear was harraſſed by the enemy. Here he formed a reſolution, which hath been cenſured by ſome critics in war as a meaſure that favoured more of youthful impatience and overboiling courage, than of that military diſcretion which ought to diſtinguiſh a commander in ſuch a delicate ſituation: but it is more eaſy to blame with an appearance of reaſon than to act in ſuch circumſtances with any certainty of ſucceſs.

Mr. Murray, in his letter to the ſecretary of ſtate, declared, that although the enemy were greatly ſuperior to him in number, yet, when he conſidered that the Engliſh forces were habituated to victory; that they were provided with a fine train of field artillery; that, in ſhutting them up at once once within the walls, he ſhould have riſqued his whole ſtake on the ſingle chance of defending a wretched fortification; a chance which could not be much leſſened by an action in the field, though ſuch an action would double the chance of ſucceſs: for theſe reaſons he had determined to hazard a battle: ſhould the event prove unproſperous, he reſolved to hold out the place to the laſt extremity; then to retreat to the iſle of Orleans or Coudres with the remainder of the garriſon, and there wait for a reinforcement.

In purſuance of theſe reſolutions he gave the neceſſary orders over night, and on the twenty-eighth day of April, at half an hour after ſix in the morning, marched out with his little army of three thouſand men, which he formed on the heights in order of battle. The right brigade, commanded by colonel Burton, conſiſted of the regiments of Amherſt, Anſtruther, Webb, and the ſecond battalion of royal Americans: the left, under colonel Fraſer, was formed of the regiments of Kennedy, Laſcelles, Townſhend, and the Highlanders. Otway's regiment, and the third battalion of royal Americans, conſtituted the corps de reſerve. Major Dalling's corps of light infantry covered the right flank; the left was ſecured by captain Huzzen's company of rangers, and one hundred volunteers, under the command of captain Macdonald; and each battalion was ſupplied with two field-pieces.

Brigadier Murray having reconnoitred the enemy, perceived their van had taken poſſeſſion of the riſing grounds about three quarters of a mile in his front; but that their army was on the march in one column. Thinking this was the critical moment to attack them before they were formed, he advanced towards them with equal order and expedition. They were ſoon driven from the Heights, though not without a warm diſpute; during which the body of their army advanced at a round pace, and formed in columns. Their van conſiſted of ten companies of grenadiers, two of volunteers, and four hundred ſavages: eight battalions, formed in four columns, with ſome bodies of Canadians in the intervals, conſtituted their main body: their rear was compoſed of two battalions and ſome Canadians in the flanks; and two thouſand Canadians formed the reſerve. Their whole army amounted to about thirteen thouſand men.

Major Dalling, with great gallantry, diſpoſſeſſed their grenadiers of a houſe and windmill, which they occupied, in order to cover the left flank; and in this attack the major and ſome of his officers were wounded: nevertheleſs, the light infantry purſued the fugitives to a corps which was formed to ſuſtain them; then the purſuers halted, and diſperſed along the front of the right: a circumſtance, which prevented that wing from taking advantage of the firſt impreſſion they had made on the left of the enemy. The light infantry being ordered to regain the flank, were, in attempting this motion, furiouſly charged and thrown into diſorder; then they retired to the rear in ſuch a ſhattered condition, that they could never again be brought up during the whole action. Otway's regiment was inſtantly ordered to advance from the body of reſerve, and ſuſtain the right wing, which the enemy twice in vain attempted to penetrate. Mean while the left brigade of the Britiſh forces did not remain inactive: they had diſpoſſeſſed the French of two redoubts, and ſuſtained with undaunted reſolution the whole efforts of the enemy's right, until they were fairly fought down, overpowered by numbers, and reduced to an handful, notwithſtanding the aſſiſtance they received from the third battalion of Royal Americans, which had been ſtationed with the body of reſerve, as well as from Kennedy's regiment poſted in the center. The French attacked with great impetuoſity; and, at length, a freſh column of the regiment de Rouſillon, penetrating the left wing of the Britiſh army, it gave way: the diſorder was ſoon communicated to the right, ſo that, after a very obſtinate diſpute, which laſted an hour and three quarters, brigadier Murray was obliged to abandon the field, with the loſs of one thouſand men killed or wounded, and the greater part of his artiliery. The enemy loſt twice the number of men, and reaped no eſſential advantage from their victory.

Mr. Murray, far from being diſpirited by this defeat, was only thereby animated to a more vigorous defence of the place which had been intruſted to his care. He reſolved to proſecute the fortifications of Quebec, which had been interrupted by the ſeverity of the winter; and the ſoldiers exerted themſelves with incredible activity, not only in labouring at the works, but alſo in the defence of the town, before which the enemy had opened trenches on the very evening of the battle. Three ſhips anchored at a ſmall diſtance below their camp; and for ſeveral days they were employed in landing their cannon, mortars, and ammunition. Mean while they worked inceſſantly at their trenches before the town; and, on the eleventh day of May, opened one bomb battery, and three batteries of cannon. Brigadier Murray made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for holding out the place to the laſt extremity: he raiſed two cavaliers, contrived ſome outworks, and planted the ramparts with one hundred and thirty-two pieces of artillery, dragged thither moſtly by the ſoldiery. Though the enemy cannonaded the place with great vivacity the firſt day, their fire ſoon ſlackened, and their batteries were, in a manner, ſilenced by the ſuperior fire of the garriſon; nevertheleſs Quebec would, in all probability, have fallen into their hands, had a French fleet from Europe got the ſtart of an Engliſh ſquadron in ſailing up the river.

Lord Colville had departed from Halifax, with the fleet under his command, on the twenty-ſecond day of April; but was retarded in his paſſage by thick fogs, contrary winds, and great ſhoals of ice floating down the river. Commodore Swanton, who had ſailed from England with a ſmall reinforcement, arrived about the beginning of May at the iſle of Bec, in the river St. Laurence, where, with two ſhips, he purpoſed to wait for the reſt of his ſquadron, which had ſeparated from him in the paſſage: but one of theſe, the Loweſtoffe, commanded by captain Deane, had entered the harbour of Quebec on the ninth day of May, and communicated to the governor the joyful news that the ſquadron was arrived in the river. Commodore Swanton no ſooner received intimation that Quebec was beſieged, than he ſailed up the river with all poſſible expedition, and on the fifteenth in the evening anchored above Point Levi. General Murray expreſſing an earneſt deſire, that the French ſquadron above the town might be removed, the commodore ordered captain Schomberg of the Diana and captain Deane of the Loweſtoffe, to ſlip their cables early next morning, and attack the enemy's fleet, conſiſting of two frigates, two armed ſhips, and a good number of ſmaller veſſels. They were no ſooner in motion than the French ſhips fled in the utmoſt diſorder. One of their frigates was driven on the rocks above Cape Diamond; the other ran aſhore, and was burned at Point au Tremble about ten leagues above the town; and all the other veſſels were taken or deſtroyed.

The enemy were ſo thunderſtruck by this unexpected diſaſter, and the certain intelligence that a ſtrong Engliſh fleet was already arrived in the river of St. Laurence, that in the following night they raiſed the ſiege of Quebec, and retreated with great precipitation, leaving their proviſions, implements, and artillery, to governor Murray, who had intended to make a vigorous ſally in the morning, and attempt to penetrate into the camp of the beſiegers, which, from the information of priſoners and deſerters, he conceived to be a very practicable ſcheme. For this purpoſe he had ſelected a body of troops, who were already under arms, when a lieutenant whom he had ſent out with a detachment to amuſe the enemy, came and aſſured him that their trenches were abandoned. He inſtantly marched out of Quebec at the head of his forces, in hope of overtaking, and making an impreſſion on their rear, that he might have ample revenge for his late diſcomfiture; but they had paſſed the river Caprouge before he could come up with their army; however, he took ſome priſoners, and a great quantity of baggage, including their tents, ſtores, magazines of proviſion and ammunition, with thirty-four pieces of battering cannon, ten field-pieces, ſix mortars, four petards, a great number of ſcaling ladders, intrenching tools, and every other implement of a ſiege. They retired to Jaques quartier, where their ammunition beginning to fail, and finding themſelves deſerted by great part of the Canadians, they reſigned all hope of ſucceeding againſt Qubec, and began to take meaſures for the preſervation of Montreal, againſt which the force under general Amherſt was directed.

There Mr. de Vaudreuil had fixed his headquarters, and there he propoſed to make his laſt ſtand againſt the efforts of the Britiſh general. He not only levied forces, collected magazines, and erected new fortifications in the iſland of Montreal, but he had even recourſe to feigned intelligence, and other arts of deluſion, to ſupport the ſpirit of the Canadians and their Indian allies, which had begun to flag, in conſequence of their being obliged to abandon the ſiege of Quebec. It muſt be owned he acted with all the ſpirit and vigilance of an experienced general, determined to exert himſelf for the preſervation of the colony, even tho' he could entertain but very little hopes of ſucceſs. Theſe, however ſlender they were, depended upon the natural ſtrength of the country, rendered almoſt inacceſſible by woods, mountains, and moraſſes, which might have retarded the progreſs of the Engliſh, and protracted the war, until a general pacification could be effected.

In the mean time major general Amherſt was diligently employed in taking meaſures for the execution of the plan he had concerted, in order to complete the conqueſt of Canada. He tranſmitted inſtructions to general Murray, directing him to advance by water towards Montreal, with all the troops that could be ſpared from the garriſon of Quebec. He detached colonel Haviland with a body of troops from Crown-point to take poſſeſſion of the iſle au Noix, in Lake-Champlain, and from thence penetrate the ſhorteſt way to the bank of the river St. Laurence; while he himſelf, with the main body of the army, amounting to above ten thouſand men, including Indians, ſhould proceed from the frontiers of New York, by the rivers of the Mohawks and Oneidas, to the lake Ontario, and ſail down the river St. Laurence to the iſland of Montreal. Thus, on the ſuppoſition that all theſe particulars could be executed, the enemy muſt have been at laſt hemmed in, and entirely ſurrounded. In purſuance of this plan, general Amherſt had provided two armed ſloops to cruiſe on the lake Ontario, under the command of captain Loring; as well as a great number of batteaus, or ſmaller veſſels for the tranſportation of the troops, artillery, and ammunition, implements, and baggage. Several regiments were ordered to advance from Albany to Oſwego; and the general, taking his departure from Schenectady, with the reſt of the forces, in the latter end of June, arrived at the ſame place on the ninth day of July.

Having received advice, that two French veſſels had appeared off Oſwego, he diſpatched ſome batteaus to Niagara with intelligence to captain Loring, who immediately ſet ſail in queſt of them; but they eſcaped his purſuit, though they had twice appeared in the neighbourhood of Oſwego ſince the arrival of the general, who endeavoured to amuſe them by detaching batteaus to different parts of the lake. The army being aſſembled, and reinforced by a conſiderable body of Indians under the command of Sir William Johnſon, the general detached colonel Haldemand with the light infantry, the grenadiers, and one battalion of Highlanders, to take poſt at the bottom of the lake, and to aſſiſt the armed veſſels in finding a paſſage to La Galette. On the tenth day of Auguſt the army embarked on board the batteaus and whale boats, and proceeded on the lake towards the mouth of the river St. Laurence. Hearing that one of the enemy's veſſels had run aground and was diſabled, and that the other lay off La Galette, he determined to make the beſt of his way down the river to Swegatchie, and attack the French fort at Iſle Royale, one of the moſt important poſts on the river St. Laurence, the ſource of which it in a great meaſure commands. On the ſeventeenth the rowgallies fell in with the French ſloop commanded by Mr. de la Broquerie, who ſurrendered after a warm engagement. Mr. Amherſt having detached ſome engineers to reconnoitre the coaſts and iſlands in the neighbourhood of Iſle Royale, he made a diſpoſition for the attack of that fortreſs, which was accordingly inveſted, after he had taken poſſeſſion of the iſlands. Some of theſe the enemy had abandoned with ſuch precipitation, as to leave behind a few ſcalps they had taken on the Mohawk river, a number of tools and utenſils, two ſwivels, ſome barrels of pitch, and a large quantity of iron. The Indians were ſo incenſed at ſight of the ſcalps, that they burned a chapel, and all the houſes of the enemy. Batteries being raiſed on the neareſt iſlands, the fort was cannonaded not only by them, but likewiſe by the armed ſloops; and a diſpoſition was made for giving the aſſault, when Mr. Pouchaut thought proper to beat a parley, and ſurrender on capitulation. The general, having taken poſſeſſion of the fort, found it ſo well ſituated for commanding the lake Ontario, and the Mohawk river, that he reſolved to maintain it with a garriſon, and employed ſome days in repairing the fortifications.

From this place his navigation down the river St. Laurence was rendered extremely difficult and dangerous, by a great number of violent riffs, or rapides, and falls; among which he loſt above fourſcore men, forty-ſix batteaus, ſeventeen whale-boats, one row-galley, with ſome artillery, ſtores, and ammunition. On the ſixth day of September the troops were debarked on the iſland of Montreal without any oppoſition, except from ſome flying parties, which exchanged a few ſhot, and then fled with precipitation. That ſame day he repaired a bridge which they had broke down in their retreat, and, after a march of two leagues, drew up his army on a plain before Montreal, where they lay all night on their arms. Montreal is, in point of importance, the ſecond place in Canada, ſituated in an iſland of the river St. Laurence, at an equal diſtance from Quebec and the lake Ontario. Its central ſituation rendered it the ſtaple of the Indian trade; yet the fortifications of it were inconſiderable, not at all adequate to the value of the place.

General Amherſt ordered ſome pieces of artillery to be brought up immediately from the landing-place at La Chine, where he had left ſome regiments for the ſecurity of the boats, and determined to undertake the ſiege in form; but in the morning of the ſeventh he received a letter from the marquis de Vaudreuil by two officers, demanding a capitulation: which, after ſome letters had paſſed between the two generals, was granted upon as favourable terms as the French had reaſon to expect, conſidering that general Murray, with the troops from Quebec, had, by this time, landed on the iſland; and colonel Haviland, with the body under his command, had juſt arrived on the ſouth-ſide of the river oppoſite to Montreal: circumſtances equally favourable and ſurpriſing, if we reflect upon the different routes they purſued, thro' an enemy's country, where they had no intelligence of each other's motions. Had any accident retarded the progreſs of general Amherſt, the reduction of Montreal would have been attempted by general Murray, who embarked with his troops at Quebec on board of a great number of ſmall veſſels, under the command of captain Deane in the Diana. This gentleman, with uncommon ability, ſurmounted the difficulties of an unknown, dangerous, and intricate navigation; and conducted the voyage with ſuch ſucceſs, that not a ſingle veſſel was loſt in the expedition. Mr. de Levis, at the head of his forces, obſerved the motions of general Murray, who, in ſailing up the river, diſtributed manifeſtoes among the Canadians, which produced all the effect he could deſire. Almoſt all the pariſhes on the ſouth-ſhore, as far as the river Sorel, ſubmitted and took an oath of neutrality; and lord Rollo diſarmed the inhabitants of the north ſhore as far as Trois Rivieres, which, though the capital of a diſtrict, being no other than an open village, was taken without reſiſtance. In a word, general Amherſt took poſſeſſion of Montreal; and thus finiſhed the conqueſt of all Canada: a conqueſt the moſt important that ever the Britiſh arms atchieved, whether we conſider the ſafety of the Engliſh colonies in North America, now ſecured from invaſion and incroachment; the extent and fertility of the country ſubdued; or the whole Indian commerce thus transferred to the traders of Great Britain.

The French miniſtry had endeavoured to ſuccour Montreal, by equipping a conſiderable number of ſtoreſhips, and ſending them out in the ſpring under convoy of a frigate; but as their officers underſtood that the Britiſh ſquadron had ſailed up the river St. Laurence before them, they took ſhelter in the bay of Chaleurs on the coaſt of Acadia, where they did not long remain unmoleſted. Captain Byron, who commanded the ſhips of war that were left at Louiſbourg, having received information of their arrival from brigadier-general Whitmore, ſailed thither with a ſquadron, and found them at anchor. The whole fleet conſiſted of one frigate, two large ſtore-ſhips, and nineteen ſail of ſmaller veſſels, the greater part of which had been taken from the merchants of Great Britain: all theſe were deſtroyed, together with two batteries which had been raiſed for their protection. The French town, conſiſting of two hundred houſes, was demoliſhed, and the ſettlement totally ruined.

All the French ſubjects inhabiting the territories from the bay of Fundy to the banks of the river St. Laurence, and all the Indians through that tract of country, were now ſubdued, and ſubjected to the Engliſh government. In the month of December, of the preceding year, the French coloniſts of Miramichi, Rickebuctou, and other places lying along the gulf of St. Laurence, made their ſubmiſſion by deputies to colonel Frye, who commanded in Fort Cumberland at Chignecto. They afterwards renewed this ſubmiſſion, in the moſt ſolemn manner, by ſubſcribing articles; by which they obliged themſelves, and the people they repreſented, to repair in the ſpring to Bay Verte, with all their effects and ſhipping, to be diſpoſed of according to the direction of colonel Laurence, governor of Halifax in Nova Scotia. They were attended by two Indian chiefs of the nation of the Mickmacks, a powerful and numerous people, now become entirely dependent upon his Britannic majeſty. In a word, by the conqueſt of Canada, the Indian fur-trade, in its full extent, was transferred into the hands of the Engliſh. The French intereſt among the ſavage tribes inhabiting an immenſe tract of country, was totally annihilated; and their American poſſeſſions ſhrunk within the limits of Louiſiana, an infant colony on the ſouth of the Miſſiſſippi, which the Britiſh arms could at any time eaſily ſubdue.

The conqueſt of Canada being finiſhed, nothing now remained to be done in North America, except the demolition of the fortifications of Louisbourg on the iſland of Cape Breton; for which purpoſe, ſome able engineers had been diſpatched from England with the ſhips commanded by captain tain Byron. By means of mines artfully diſpoſed and well conſtructed, the fortifications were reduced to a heap of rubbiſh; the glacis was levelled, and the ditches were filled. All the artillery, ammunition, and implements of war, were tranſported to Halifax: but the barracks were repaired ſo as to accommodate three hundred men occaſionally; and the hoſpital, with the private houſes, were left ſtanding.

The French ſtill retained poſſeſſion of the fertile country lying on each ſide of the great river Miſſiſſippi, which empties itſelf into the Gulph of Florida; but the colony was ſo thinly peopled and ſo ill provided, that, far from being able to endanger the Engliſh ſettlements, it ſcarce could have ſubſiſted, unleſs the Britiſh traders had been baſe and treacherous enough to ſupply it from time to time with proviſions and neceſſaries. The ſame infamous commerce was carried on with ſeveral French plantations in the Weſt-Indies; inſomuch that the governors of provinces, and commanders of ſquadrons ſtationed in thoſe ſeas, made formal complaints of it to the miniſtry. In conſequence of theſe repreſentations, Mr. Pitt ſent a letter to the ſeveral governors and councils in North America, importing, that the commanders of his majeſty's forces and fleets in North America and the Weſt-Indies, had tranſmitted certain and repeated intelligences, of an illegal and moſt pernicious trade carried on by the king's ſubjects in North-America, and the Weſt Indies; as well to the French iſlands, as to the French ſettlements on the continent of America; and particularly to the rivers Mobile and Miſſiſſippi; by which the enemies, to the great reproach and detriment of government, were ſupplied with proviſions and other neceſſaries; whereby they were principally, if not alone, enabled to ſuſtain and protract this long and expenſive war: and that it further appearing that large ſums of bullion were ſent by the king's ſubjects to the above places, in return whereof commodities were taken, which interfered with the product of the Britiſh colonies themſelves, in open contempt of the authority of the mother-country, as well as the moſt manifeſt prejudice of the manufactures and trade of Great-Britain: in order to put the moſt ſpeedy and effectual ſtop to ſuch flagitious practices, ſo utterly ſubverſive of all laws, and ſo highly repugnant to the well-being of this kingdom; it was his majeſty's expreſs will and pleaſure, that they ſhould forthwith make the ſtricteſt and moſt diligent enquiry into the ſtate of this dangerous and ignominious trade: and that they ſhould uſe every means in their power to detect and diſcover perſons concerned either as principals or acceſſaries therein: that they ſhould take every ſtep, authoriſed by law, to bring ſuch heinous offenders to the moſt exemplary and condign puniſhment: that as ſoon as may be, and from time to time, they ſhould tranſmit to him, for the king's information, full and particular accounts of the progreſs they ſhould have made in the execution of this his majeſty's command; to the which the king expected they ſhould pay the moſt exact obedience: and that they were further to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to trace out and inveſtigate the various artifices and evaſions, by which the dealers in this iniquitous intercourſe found means to cover their criminal proceedings, and elude the law; in order that from ſuch lights due and timely conſiderations might be had, what farther proviſion might be neceſſary to reſtrain an evil of ſuch extenſive and pernicious conſequences.

Notwithſtanding this peremptory intimation, the temptation of extraordinary profit excited the merchants not only to aſſiſt the enemies of their country, but alſo to run all riſques in eluding the vigilance of the legiſlature. The inhabitants of Martinique found a plentiful market of proviſion furniſhed by the Britiſh ſubjects at the Dutch iſlands of St. Euſtatia and Curacoa; and thoſe that were ſettled on the iſland of Hiſpaniola were ſupplied in the ſame manner at the Spaniſh ſettlement of Monte Chriſto.

While the Britiſh arms triumphed and proſpered in almoſt every quarter of the univerſe, the coloniſts of Jamaica ran the moſt imminent hazard of being extirpated by a domeſtic enemy. The negro ſlaves of that iſland, grown inſolent in the contemplation of their own formidable numbers, or by obſerving the ſupine indolence of their maſters, or ſtimulated by that appetite for liberty, ſo natural to the mind of man, began, in the courſe of this year, to entertain thoughts of ſhaking off the yoke by means of a general inſurrection. Aſſemblies were held, and plans projected for this purpoſe. At length they concerted a ſcheme for riſing in arms all at once in different parts of the iſland, in order to maſſacre all the white men, and take poſſeſſion of the government. They reſolved, that this deſign ſhould be put in execution immediately after the departure of the fleet for Europe: but their plan was defeated by their own ignorance and impatience. Thoſe of the conſpirators, that belonged to captain Forreſt's eſtate, being impelled by the fumes of intoxication, fell ſuddenly upon the overſeer while he ſat at ſupper with ſome friends, and butchered the whole company. Being immediately joined by ſome of their confederates, they attacked the neighbouring plantations, where they repeated the ſame barbarities, and ſeizing all the arms and ammunition that fell in their way, began to grow formidable to the colony.

The governor was no ſooner informed of this diſturbance, than he iſſued a proclamation, ſubjecting the coloniſts to martial law. All other buſineſs was interrupted, and every man took to his arms. The regular troops, joined by the militia and a conſiderable number of volunteers, marched from Spaniſh Town to St. Mary's, where the inſurrection began, and ſkirmiſhed with the inſurgents; but as they declined ſtanding any regular engagement, and truſted chiefly to buſh-fighting, the governor employed againſt them the free blacks, commonly known by the name of the Wild Negroes, now peaceably ſettled under the protection of the government. Theſe auxiliaries, in conſideration of a price ſet upon the heads of the rebels, attacked them in their own way, ſlew them by ſurprize, until their ſtrength was broken, and numbers made away with themſelves, in deſpair; ſo that the inſurrection was ſuppoſed to be quelled about the beginning of May: but in June it broke out again with redoubled fury, and the rebels were reinforced to a very conſiderable number. The regular troops and the militia, tia, joined by a body of ſailors, formed a camp under the command of colonel Spragge, who ſent out detachments againſt the negroes, a good number of whom were killed and ſome taken; but the reſt, inſtead of ſubmitting, took ſhelter in the woods and mountains. The priſoners being tried, and found guilty of rebellion, were put to death by a variety of tortures. Some were hanged; ſome beheaded; ſome burned; and ſome fixed alive upon gibets. One of theſe laſt lived eight days and eighteen hours, ſuſpended under a vertical ſun, without being refreſhed by one drop of water, or receiving any manner of ſuſtenance.

In order to prevent ſuch inſurrections for the future, the juſtices aſſembled at the ſeſſions of the peace, ordained by a public decree, that no negro-ſlave ſhould be allowed to quit his plantation without a white conductor, or a ticket of leave: that every negro playing at any ſort of game ſhould be ſcourged through the public ſtreets: that every publican ſuffering ſuch gaming in his houſe ſhould forfeit forty ſhillings: that every proprietor ſuffering his negroes to beat a drum, blow a horn, or make any other noiſe in his plantation, ſhould be fined in ten pounds; and every overſeer allowing theſe irregularities, ſhould pay half that ſum, to be demanded, or diſtrained for, by any civil or military officer: that every free negro, or mulatto, ſhould wear a blue croſs on his right ſhoulder, on pain of impriſonment; that no mulatto, Indian, or negro, ſhould hawk or ſell any thing, except freſh fiſh and milk, on pain of being ſcourged: that rum and punch houſes ſhould be ſhut during divine ſervice on Sundays, under the penalty of twenty ſhillings; and that thoſe who had petit licences ſhould ſhut up their houſes on other nights at nine o' clock. Notwithſtanding theſe examples and regulations, a body of rebellious negroes ſtill ſubſiſted in places that were deemed inacceſſible to regular forces, and from theſe they made nocturnal irruptions into the neareſt plantations, where they acted with all the wantonneſs of barbarity; ſo that the people of Jamaica were obliged to conduct themſelves with the utmoſt vigilance and circumſpection, while rear-admiral Holmes, who commanded at ſea, took every precaution to ſecure the iſland from inſult or invaſion.

Nor did he confine his ſole attention to the ſecurity of Jamaica: he likewiſe contrived and executed ſchemes for annoying the enemy at open ſea. Having, in the month of October, received intimation that five French frigates were lying at Cape Francois on the iſland of Hiſpaniola, in order to convoy a fleet of merchant ſhips to Europe, he ſtationed the ſhips under his command, in ſuch a manner as was moſt likely to intercept this fleet; and his diſpoſition was attended with ſucceſs. The enemy ſailed from the Cape, to the number of eight ſail, on the ſixteenth, and next day they were chaced by the king's ſhips the Hampſhire, Lively, and Boreas, which however could not overtake them, as there was little wind, and that variable. In the evening the breeze freſhened, and about midnight the Boreas came up with the Sirenne, commanded by commodore Mac Cartie. They engaged with great vivacity for about twenty-five minutes, when the Sirenne ſhot a-head, and made the beſt of her way. The Boreas was ſo damaged in her rigging, that ſhe could not cloſe with the enemy again till next day at two in the afternoon, when the action was renewed off the eaſt end of Cuba, and maintained till forty minutes paſt four, when Mr. Mac Cartie ſtruck.

In the mean time, the Hampſhire and Lively gave chace to the other four French frigates, which ſteered ſouthward with all the ſail they could carry, in order to reach the weſt end of Tortuga, and take refuge in Port au Prince. On the eighteenth the Lively, by the help of her oars, came up with the Valeur at half an hour paſt ſeven in the morning; and after a hot action that continued an hour and an half, compelled the enemy to ſubmit. The Hampſhire ſtood after the other three, and, about four in the afternoon, ran up between the duke de Choiſeul and the Prince Edward. Theſe he engaged at the ſame time; but the firſt, having the advantage of the wind, made her retreat into Port au Paix: the other ran aſhore about two leagues to leeward, and ſtruck her colours; but, at the approach of the Hampſhire, the enemy ſet her on fire, and ſhe blew up. This was alſo the fate of the Fleur de Lis, which had run into Freſh-water bay, a little farther to leeward of Port au Prince. Thus, by the prudent diſpoſition of admiral Holmes, and the gallantry of his three captains, Norbury, Uvedale, and Maitland, two large frigates of the enemy were taken, and three deſtroyed.

The ſpirit of the captains was happily ſeconded by an extraordinary exertion of courage in the inferior officers and common men. Immediately after the capture of the French frigates, eight of the enemy's privateers were deſtroyed or brought into Jamaica. Two of theſe, namely the Vainqueur of ten guns, ſixteen ſwivels, and ninety men, and the Mackau of ſix ſwivels, and fifteen men, had run into ſhoal-water in Cumberland harbour, on the iſland of Cuba. The boats of the Trent and Boreas were manned under the direction of the lieutenants Millar and Stuart, who being rowed up to the Vainqueur, boarded and took poſſeſſion under a cloſe fire, after having ſurmounted many other difficulties. The Mackau was taken, without any reſiſtance; then the boats proceeded againſt the Gueſpe of eight guns and eighty-five men, which lay at anchor farther up in the Lagune; but before they came up, the enemy had ſet her on fire, and ſhe was deſtroyed.

The ſame activity and reſolution diſtinguiſhed the captains and officers of the ſquadron commanded by Sir James Douglas off the Leeward iſlands. In the month of September, the captains Obrien and Taylor, of the ſhips Temple and Griffin, being on a joint cruiſe off the iſlands Grenadas, received intelligence that the Virgin, formerly a Britiſh ſloop of war, which had been taken by the enemy, then lay at anchor, together with three privateers, under protection of three forts on the iſland. They accordingly ſailed thither in order to attack them; and their enterprize was happily crowned with ſucceſs. After a warm engagement, that laſted ſeveral hours, the enemies batteries were ſilenced, and indeed demoliſhed, and the Engliſh captains took poſſeſſion of the four prizes. They afterwards entered another harbour of that iſland, having firſt demoliſhed another fort; and there there lay four days umoleſted, at the expiration of which they carried off three other prizes. In their return to Antigua, they fell in with thirteen ſhips, bound to Martinique with proviſions, and took them all without reſiſtance. About the ſame time, eight or nine privateers were taken by the ſhips which commodore Sir James Douglas employed in cruiſing round the iſland of Guadaloupe; ſo that the Britiſh commerce in thoſe ſeas flouriſhed under his care and protection.

Having thus given a particular account of all the military tranſactions that diſtinguiſhed this year in Europe, America, and the Weſt Indies, we muſt now turn our eyes to the progreſs of the Britiſh arms in the Eaſt Indies, where they were no leſs ſucceſsful than in the Weſt Indies. After the reduction of Arcot, the garriſons of Permacoil and Allumparva ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war in the beginning of May. The Falmouth compelled the Haarlem, a French ſhip from Merguy, to run aſhore to the northward of Pondicherry. The important ſettlement of Carical was reduced by the ſea and land forces commanded by rear-admiral Corniſh and major Monſon, and the French garriſon made priſoners of war.

Colonel Coote, after having defeated the French general Lally in the field, and ſubdued ſeveral of the enemy's ſettlements on the coaſt of Coromandel, at length ſhut them up within the walls of Pondicherry, the principal ſeat of the French Eaſt India company, large, populous, well fortified, and defended by a numerous garriſon, under the immediate command of their general. In the month of October admiral Stevens departed from Trincamaley with all his ſquadron, in order to its being repaired, except five ſail of the line, which he left under the command of captain Haldane to block up Pondicherry by ſea, while Mr. Coote ſhould carry on the ſiege by land. By this diſpoſition, and the activity of the Britiſh officers, the place was ſo ſtreightened for want of proviſions as to be almoſt reduced to a ſtarving condition, even before the ſiege could be undertaken in form; for the rainy ſeaſon rendered all regular approaches impracticable. Theſe rains being abated by the twenty-ſixth day of November, colonel Coote directed the engineers to pitch upon proper places for erecting batteries, that ſhould enfilade or flank the works of the fortreſs, without expoſing their own men to any ſevere fire from the enemy. Accordingly four batteries were conſtructed in different places, ſo as to anſwer theſe purpoſes, and opened all at once on the eighth day of December at mid-night. Though placed at a conſiderable diſtance, they were plied with good effect, and the beſieged returned the fire with great vivacity. This mutual cannonading continued until the twenty-ninth day of the month, when the engineers were employed in raiſing another battery near enough to effect a breach in the north-weſt counter-guard and curtain. Though the approaches were retarded ſome days by a violent ſtorm, which almoſt ruined the works, the damage was ſoon repaired; a conſiderable poſt was taken from the enemy by aſſault, and afterwards regained by the French grenadiers, through the timidity of the Sipoys, by whom it was defended. By the fifteenth of January, a ſecond battery being raiſed within point-blank, a breach was made in the curtain; the weſt face and flank of the north-weſt baſtion were ruined, and the guns of the enemy intirely ſilenced.

The garriſon and inhabitants of Pondicherry being now in danger of periſhing with hunger, the principal of the Jeſuits, accompanied by two civilians, came out, and offered terms of capitulation. The governor, preſerving all his haughtineſs, which neither his errors nor his misfortunes could abate, declined to offer any terms: he ſent out a paper full of invectives againſt the Engliſh, for the breach of treaties relative to India. He alledged, that theſe breaches rendered him incapable of propoſing any conditions; and, in conſequence, he rather ſuffered the Engliſh troops to take poſſeſſion of the place, than formally ſurrendered it. As the governor refuſed to capitulate, the propoſals of the inhabitants were little regarded; and the city of Pondicherry, with a garriſon of about fourteen hundred European ſoldiers, a vaſt quantity of military ſtores, and great riches, was given up at diſcretion to the victorious arms of the Engliſh.

Nothing can be ſaid too highly of the conduct, courage, and perſeverance of the officers and ſoldiers during a tedious ſiege and a blockade of eight months, in a climate ſo unfavourable to all military operations. Colonel Coote gave the final blow to the French power in India: he was now undiſputed maſter of the rich coaſt of Coromandel; the French power was wholly annihilated; the neutral nations were contemptible; the princes of the country regarded us with awe and veneration; and nothing but a little French ſettlement on the coaſt of Malabar, called Mahie (and which was ſoon after reduced) hindered our commanding the whole trade of the vaſt peninſula of India, from the Ganges to the Indies, the moſt extenſive and profitable ſphere of commerce in the world.

It muſt be obſerved, likewiſe, for the honour of the ſervice, that, during the whole expedition, the moſt perfect harmony prevailed between the land and ſea officers, who vied with each other in contributing their efforts towards the ſucceſs of the enterprize. On the twenty-fifth day of December rear-admiral Stevens arrived with four ſhips of the line, having parted with rear-admiral Corniſh and his diviſion in ſtormy weather: but he joined them at Pondicherry before the place was taken. On the firſt day of January a violent tempeſt obliged admiral Stevens to ſlip his cables and put to ſea, where he was ſeparated from the reſt of his ſquadron; and when in three days he returned to the road of Pondicherry, he had the mortification to find that his diviſion had ſuffered ſeverely from the ſtorm. The ſhips of war, called the Duke Acquitaine and the Sunderland, foundered in the ſtorm, and their crews periſhed. The Newcaſtle, the Queenborough, and Protector fireſhip, were driven on ſhore and deſtroyed; but the men were ſaved, together with the cannon, ſtores, and proviſions. Many other ſhips ſuſtained conſiderable damage, which, however, was ſoon repaired. Mr. Stevens, having intercepted a letter from general Lally to Mr. Ramond, the French preſident at Pullicat, in which he informed him of the intire deſtruction of the Engliſh fleet, and ſollicited immediate assistance; the British admiral dispatched letters to the Dutch and Danish settlements on that coast, intimating, that, notwithstanding the insinuations of general Lally, he had eleven sail of the line, with two frigates, under his command, all fit for service, in the road of Pondicherry, which was closely invested and blockaded both by sea and land. He therefore declared, that as in that case it was contrary to the law of nations for any neutral power to relieve or succour the besieged, he was determined to seize any vessel that should attempt to throw provisions into the place.

While the arms of Great Britain were thus successful in almost every quarter of the globe, an event happened, which, for a moment, obscured the splendor of her triumphs, and damped the joy which these occasioned. On the twenty-fifth day of October, early in the morning, king George the second was, without any previous disorder, suddenly seized with the agony of death, at the palace at Kensington. He had risen at his usual hour, called his page, drank his chocolate, and inquired about the wind, as anxious for the arrival of the foreign mails; then he opened a window of his apartment, and observing the weather was serene, signified his intention to walk in the garden. In a few minutes after this intimation, while he remained alone in his chamber, he fell down upon the floor: the noise of his fall brought his attendants into the room, who lifted him on the bed, where he desired in a faint voice, that the princess Amelia might be called; but, before she could reach the apartment, he had expired. An attempt was made to bleed him, but without effect; and indeed his malady was far beyond the reach of art; for, when the cavity of the thorax or chest was opened, and inspected by the serjeant surgeons, they found the right ventricle of the heart actually ruptured, and a great quantity of blood discharged through the aperture into the surrounding pericardium; so that he must have died instantaneously in consequence of the effusion.

Such was the unexpected, though not premature death of George the second, king of Great Britain, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-fourth of his reign. He was in his person rather lower than the middle size, well-shaped, erect, with eyes remarkably prominent, a high nose, and fair complexion. In his temper he is said to have been sudden and violent; but this, though it influenced his private behaviour, made no impression on his public conduct, which was always sufficiently deliberate and attentive to his own interest, and that of his subjects.

Sincere and honest in his intentions, he was never known to be guilty of deceit: true to his word, he was never seen to violate his promise: steady in his favour and protection to his servants, he never changed them willingly; and those who attended more immediately on his person, were scarce ever removed, but grew old along with him, or died in their places. But having been in a manner compelled, by a violent faction, to relinquish a minister, for whom he had a great affection, and in whom he reposed an unlimited confidence, it afterwards became a matter of more indifference to him by whom he was served in the affairs of his government.

His parts were not lively or brilliant; but the whole of his conduct demonstrates, that he had a judgment both solid and comprehensive. He understood the interests of the several sovereigns of Europe; and was particularly skilled in all the intricacies of that political labyrinth, the system of Germany; of the liberties of which he was, through his whole life, a most zealous assertor. In the last war but one he took up arms, and even risqued his own person, when, by the projected dismemberment of the house of Austria, they were in danger of falling a sacrifice to a French faction. In the war which succeeded, when the liberties of the empire were threatened by the Austrian family, he resisted with equal firmness, that very house which he had formerly exposed his life to defend.

He lived entirely to extinguish party and the spirit of party in his own dominions: it was not till the close of his reign, that his family might have been considered as firmly and immoveably seated on the throne; but he, having baffled all the private machinations of his enemies policy, subdued at length the utmost efforts of their force: and though, on that menacing occasion, he experienced, in the fullest measure, the affection of his people, yet the completion of this great service to his family he owed chiefly to the capacity and bravery of his own son.

Placed in the highest and most exalted station, he lived with his queen in that kind of harmony and confidence that is seen between the best suited couple in private life. He had a numerous issue, in which he had great cause of satisfaction, and very little of disquiet, except what was the almost necessary consequence of a life protracted to a late period. He survived several of his children. He had the satisfaction to see in his successor, what is very rare, the most dutiful obedience, the most perfect acquiescence in his will; and, what is no less rare, contrary to the fortune of most old kings, he never possessed more fully the love of his subjects than in the last year of his life. And he died at that very period, when the terror of his arms, the power of his kingdoms, and the wisdom of his government, were all raised to almost as high a pitch as they could possibly reach: they were indeed carried to such a height of glory and prosperity, as had never been exceeded, and hardly ever equalled in the reign of the most fortunate of his predecessors. Arriving in England at a riper age, and, of consequence, having never been able to attain a perfect knowledge of the force and beauties of the English language; he never shewed a sufficient regard to the British literature, which in his reign did not flourish; and this may be considered as the greatest, or rather the only blemish that lay upon his government. Though frequently censured, and perhaps not unjustly, as a little too attentive to money in some minute particulars, yet this disposition never discovered itself in one rapacious act, nor ever influenced his conduct on any important occasion; for it is now well known, that he shewed no improper parsimony, when the late war broke out. In fact, he expended so much in that interesting emergence, that, on his decease, his private wealth was found to be greatly inferior to what had been commonly imagined.

It has been often alleged, that during his whole life, he ſhewed a remarkable affection to his Hanoverian ſubjects: but the laſt act of it demonſtrated that they were far from engroſſing the whole of his regard; and that in reality his German poſſeſſions held no other place in his eſtimation than what their relative importance to the reſt of his dominions naturally demanded: for when that truly ſevere trial came, in which the intereſts of England and Hanover were ſeparated; when a war was begun for an object wholly foreign to this laſt country; a war, in which Hanover muſt ſuffer much, and could hope for nothing; even then his majeſty did not heſitate a moment to expoſe his German dominions to almoſt inevitable ruin, rather than make, or even propoſe, the ſmalleſt abatement from the immenſity of the Engliſh rights in America: a conduct that more than wipes off every ſuſpicion of an improper partiality, and which ſurely ought never to be mentioned without the higheſt gratitude to the memory of that magnanimous prince.

Were we to ranſack the whole ſtores of ancient and modern hiſtory, it would perhaps be impoſſible to exhibit a more pleaſing or inſtructive picture, than what might be formed by taking a juſt view of his late majeſty's conduct to theſe two ſo differently conſtituted parts of his dominions. His virtue was proved by two of the greateſt trials to which the nature of man is ſubject; the truſt of abſolute and unlimited power, and the moſt exalted ſtation, circumſcribed by the ſtricteſt laws. For theſe two ſo very different ſituations, very different and almoſt oppoſite tempers and talents have been always thought neceſſary. But George II. had a mind perfectly adapted to both: for whilſt in England, he kept the liberties of his people inviolate, and, like a wiſe magiſtrate, was pleaſed to make his authority co-operate with law, and his will freely ſubſervient to the wiſdom of ages; in Hanover, like an indulgent father, acting only from the ſentiments of a paternal heart, his affection and his equity ſupplied the want of law and conſtitution. He left, indeed, to his illuſtrious ſucceſſor, an admirable example, which he has hitherto not only followed, but in many reſpects exceeded: and his ſubjects take the greater intereſt in his virtues, as they look upon them as more peculiarly their own; and they now boaſt a prince who neither has, nor can have, any partiality but the beſt, and who is in birth as well as in inclination a Briton †.

I ſhall cloſe my account of this reign with particulariſing the principal domeſtic occurrences that engroſſed the attention of the public during the courſe of this year.

In the month of December, 1759, William Horne, a gentleman of ſome fortune in Derbyſhire, was executed at Nottingham, in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age, for the murder of an infant born of his own ſiſter, in the year 1724. On the third day after the birth, this brutal ruffian thruſt the child into a linen bag, and, accompanied by his own brother on horſeback, conveyed it to Anneſley in Nottinghamſhire, where it was next day found dead under a hay-ſtack. Though this unnatural monſter knew how much he lay at the mercy of his brother, whom he had made privy to this affair, far from endeavouring to engage his ſecrecy by offices of kindneſs and marks of affection, he treated him as an alien to his blood; not barely with indifference, but even with the moſt barbarous rigour. He not only defrauded him of his right, but exacted of him the loweſt menial ſervices; beheld him ſtarving in a cottage, while he lived himſelf in affluence; and refuſed to relieve, with a morſel of bread, the children of his own brother begging at his gate.

It was the reſentment of this pride and barbarity which, in all likelihood, firſt impelled the other to revenge. He pretended qualms of conſcience, and diſcloſed the tranſaction of the child to ſeveral individuals. As the brother was univerſally hated for the inſolence and brutality of his diſpoſition, information was given againſt him, and a reſolution formed to bring him to condign puniſhment. Being appriſed of this deſign, he tampered with his brother, and deſired that he would retract, upon the trial, the evidence he had given before the juſtice. Though the brother rejected this ſcheme of perjury, he offered to withdraw himſelf from the kingdom, if he might have five pounds to defray the expence of his voyage. So ſordidly avaricious was the other, that he refuſed to advance this miſerable pittance, though he knew his own life depended upon his compliance. He was accordingly apprehended, tried, and convicted on his brother's evidence; and then he confeſſed the particulars of expoſing the infant. He denied, indeed that he had any thought the child would periſh, and declared he intended it as a preſent to the late Mr. Chaworth of Anneſley, at whoſe gate it was laid: but as he appeared to be a hardened wretch, devoid of humanity, ſtained with the complicated crimes of tyranny, fraud, rapine, inceſt, and murder, very little credit is due to his declaration.

But no ſubject ſo much engaged the attention of the public, as did the caſe of lord George Sackville, who had by this time reſigned his command in Germany, and returned to England, where his character was repreſented in the moſt odious and deteſtable colours. With the firſt news of the battle of Minden, arrived the defamation of this officer. He was accuſed of having diſobeyed orders, and of having been guilty of the moſt ſhameful cowardice. Theſe were the ſuggeſtions of a vague report, which no perſon could trace to its origin; yet this report immediately gave birth to one of the moſt inflammatory pamphlets that ever was exhibited to the public. The firſt charge had alarmed the people of England, jealous in honour, ſudden and raſh in their reſentments, and obſtinately adhering to the prejudices they have eſpouſed. The implied accuſation in the orders of prince Ferdinand, and the combuſtible matter ſuperadded by the pamphlet-writer, kindled up ſuch a blaze of indignation in the minds of the people, as admitted of no temperament or controul. An abhorrence and deteſtation of lord George Sackville, as a coward and a traitor, became the univerſal paſſion, which acted by contagion, infecting all degrees of people from the higheſt to the loweſt; and no individual, who had the leaſt regard for his own character and quiet, would venture to preach up moderation, or even adviſe a ſuſpenſion of belief, until more certain information could be procured. Freſh fuel was continually thrown in by obſcure authors of pamphlets and news-papers, who ſtigmatized and inſulted with ſuch a ſpirit of virulence, that one would have imagined they were actuated by perſonal motives, not retained by mercenary booksellers, againſt that unfortunate nobleman. Not ſatisfied with inventing circumſtances to his diſhonour, in his conduct on the laſt occaſion, they pretended to take a retroſpective view of his character, and produced a number of anecdotes to his prejudice, which had never before ſeen the light, and but for this occaſion had probably never been known. Not that all the writings, which appeared on this ſubject, contained freſh matter of aggravation againſt lord George Sackville. Some writers, either encouraged by the hope of reward, or hired to betray the cauſe which they undertook to defend, entered the liſts as profeſſed champions of the accuſed, aſſumed the pen in his behalf, devoid of ſenſe, unfurniſhed with materials, and produced performances, which could not fail to injure his character among all thoſe, who believed, that he countenanced their endeavours, and ſupplied them with the facts and arguments of his defence.

Such preciſely was the ſtate of the diſpute, when lord George Sackville arrived in London. He was now made acquainted with the particulars of this imputed guilt, which he had before indiſtinctly learned. He was accuſed of having diſobeyed three ſucceſſive orders he had received from the general, during the action at Minden, to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, which he commanded, and ſuſtain the infantry that were engaged; and after the cavalry were put in motion, of having halted them unneceſſarily, and marched ſo ſlow, that they could not reach the place of action in time to be of any ſervice; by which conduct the opportunity was loſt of attacking the enemy when they gave way, and rendering the victory more glorious and deciſive.

The firſt ſtep which lord George took towards the vindication of his own character, was in preſenting to the public the following addreſs: "The various reports, ſaid he, that have been propagated to my diſadvantage, and the many falſhoods which have been aſſerted to ruin my character, lay me under the neceſſity of remaining not entirely ſilent, though I am debarred at preſent from ſtating my caſe to the public, as I ſhould have done, had I not aſſurances of obtaining a court-martial for my trial; the only legal and effectual method of convincing the world how little foundation there has been for the torrent of calumny and abuſe, which has been ſo maliciouſly thrown out againſt me.

"I had rather, upon this occaſion, ſubmit myſelf to all the inconveniencies that may ariſe from the want of ſtile, than borrow aſſiſtance from the pens of others, as I can have no hopes of eſtabliſhing my character, but from the force of truth. I ſhall, therefore, as plainly and diſtinctly as poſſible, relate a few circumſtances, which will at leaſt ſhew that no body could be more deſirous than I am to bring truth to light, and ſubject my conduct to the ſtricteſt ſcrutiny.

"The inſtant I found by the implied cenſure given out in orders the ſecond of Auguſt, that my conduct had appeared in an unfavourable light to prince Ferdinand, on the day of action, I endeavoured to inform myſelf what particular I had either failed in or neglected my duty; I heard in general of diſobedience of orders, but I could fix no certain period of time to my ſuppoſed crime, till colonel Fitzroy acquainted me with what had paſſed between his ſerene highneſs and him upon my ſubject, in regard to the orders delivered to me by him (colonel Fitzroy) that day. Whenever my trial comes, I ſhall endeavour to clear up that point to the ſatisfaction of the public: my own aſſertions may have little weight, but the oaths of witneſſes, whoſe veracity cannot be called in queſtion, will, I truſt, prove my innocence beyond the poſſibility of doubt.

"Under theſe circumſtances, I immediately applied for his majeſty's permiſſion to return to England, that I might anſwer any accuſation that ſhould be brought againſt me; for, as commander in chief of the Britiſh forces in Germany, no perſon there could order a court-martial for my trial, had there been an accuſation laid; the power of ſummoning courts-martial and approving their ſentences, was veſted in me by my commiſſion, and no Britiſh officer or ſoldier could be tried by any other authority.

"As ſoon as I arrived in London, on Friday-evening the ſeventh, I inſtantly wrote the following letter to the ſecretary of ſtate.

"My Lord,

"I have the honour of acquainting your lordſhip with my arrival in England, in purſuance of his majeſty's permiſſion, ſent to me, at my requeſt, by your lordſhip.

"I thought myſelf much injured abroad, by an implied cenſure upon my conduct; I find I am ſtill more unfortunate at home, by being publickly repreſented as having neglected my duty in the ſtrongeſt manner, by diſobeying the poſitive orders of his ſerene highneſs prince Ferdinand: as I am conſcious of neither neglect, nor diſobedience of orders; as I am certain I did my duty to the utmoſt of my abilities; and as I am perſuaded that the prince himſelf would have found, that he had no juſt cauſe of complaint againſt me, had he condeſcended to have inquired into my conduct, before he had expreſſed his diſapprobation of it, from the partial repreſentation of others: I therefore moſt humbly requeſt, that I may at laſt have a public opportunity given me of attempting to juſtify myſelf to his majeſty, and to my country, by a court-martial being appointed; that if I am guilty, I may ſuffer ſuch puniſhment as I may have deſerved; and, if innocent, that I may ſtand acquitted in the opinion of the world: but it is really too ſevere to have been cenſured unheard; to have have been condemned before I was tried; and to be informed neither of my crime, nor of my accuſers. I am, my Lord, &c. &c.

GEORGE SACKVILLE."

"I received an anſwer to this letter on Monday the tenth, in which I was aſſured that a court-martial, upon my application, would be granted, as ſoon as the officers, capable of giving evidence, could leave their poſts; but previouſly to the receipt of that letter, I was diſmiſſed from all my military employments; notwithſtanding which diſmiſſion, I ſtill hope, and am informed, that I may have the advantage of a legal trial.

"In the mean time, the only indulgence I have to aſk is, that the public will ſuſpend its judgment till ſuch facts can be produced, from which alone the truth can appear; but if plans of a battle are to be referred to, which can give no juſt idea of it; if diſpoſitions of the cavalry and infantry are ſuppoſed, which never exiſted; if orders for attacks and purſuits are quoted, which never were delivered; and if diſobedience to thoſe imaginary orders are aſſerted as a crime, what can an injured officer, under ſuch circumſtances, have recourſe to, but claiming that juſtice, which is due to every Engliſhman, of being heard before he is condemned: the ſooner that happens, the happier I ſhall be, as I am conſcious my innocence muſt appear, when real facts are truly ſtated and fully proved.

GEORGE SACKVILLE."

This addreſs, however, though extremely well approved by every man of ſenſe and reflection, was not able to ſtem the torrent of popular prejudice, which flowed againſt him with irreſiſtible impetuoſity. He might, therefore, have retired in quiet and ſafety, and left it to ebb at leiſure. This would have been generally deemed a prudential ſtep, by all thoſe who conſidered the unfavourable medium through which every particular of his conduct muſt have been viewed at that juncture, even by men who cheriſhed the moſt candid intentions; when they reflected upon the power, influence, and popularity of his accuſer; the danger of aggravating the reſentment of the people, already too conſpicuous, and the riſque of hazarding his life on the honour and integrity of witneſſes, who might think their fortunes depended upon the nature of the evidence they ſhould give. Notwithſtanding thoſe ſuggeſtions, lord George, ſeemingly impatient of the imputation under which his character laboured, inſiſted upon the privilege of a legal trial, which was granted accordingly, after the judges had given it as their opinion, that he might be tried by a court-martial, though he no longer retained any commiſſion in the ſervice. A court of general officers being appointed and aſſembled to enquire into his conduct, the judge-advocate informed the court, that lord George was charged with having diſobeyed the orders of prince Ferdinand, relative to the battle of Minden.

In order to give the reader a more diſtinct view of the charge, it is neceſſary to remind him that lord George Sackville commanded the cavalry of the right wing, conſiſting of Hanoverian and Britiſh horſe, diſpoſed in two lines, the Britiſh being at the extremity on the right, extending to the village of Hartum; the Hanoverian cavalry forming the left, that reached almoſt to an open wood or grove, which divided the horſe from the line of infantry, particularly from that part of the line of infantry conſiſting of two brigades of Britiſh foot, the Hanoverian guards, and Hardenberg's regiment. This was the body of troops which ſuſtained the brunt of the battle with the moſt incredible courage and perſeverance. They, of their own accord, advanced to attack the left of the enemy's cavalry, through a moſt dreadful fire of artillery and ſmall-arms, to which they were expoſed in front and flank; they withſtood the repeated attacks of the whole French gendarmerie, whom, at length, they totally routed, together with a body of Saxon troops on their left; and to their valour the victory was chiefly owng. The ground from which theſe troops advanced was a kind of heath or plain which opened a conſiderable way to the left, where the reſt of the army was formed in order of battle; but on the right it was bounded by the wood, on the other ſide of which the cavalry of the right wing was poſted, having in front the village of Halen, from whence the French had been driven by the piquets in the army there poſted, and in front of them a windmill, ſituated in the middle ſpace between them and a battery placed on the left of the enemy.

Early in the morning captain Malhorti had, by order of prince Ferdinand, poſted the cavalry of the right wing in the ſituation we have juſt deſcribed, the village of Hartum with incloſures on the right, a narrow wood on the left, the village of Halen in their front, and a windmill in the middle of an open plain, which led directly to the enemy. In this poſition lord George Sackville was directed to remain until he ſhould receive further orders; and here it was thoſe orders were given which he was ſaid to have diſobeyed. Indeed, he was previouſly charged with having neglected the orders of the preceding evening, which imported, that the horſes ſhould be ſaddled at one in the morning, though the tents were not to be ſtruck, nor the troops under arms, until they ſhould receive further orders. He was accuſed of having diſobeyed theſe orders, and of having come late into the field, after the cavalry was formed.

Captain Winchingrode, aid-du-camp to prince Ferdinand, declared upon oath, that while the infantry of the right wing were advancing towards the enemy for the ſecond time, he was ſent with orders to lord George Sackville to advance with the cavalry of the right wing, and ſuſtain the infantry, which was going to engage, by forming the horſe under his command, upon the heath, in a third line behind the regiments: that he delivered theſe orders to lord George Sackville, giving him to underſtand, that he ſhould march the cavalry through the wood or trees on his left, to the heath where they were to be formed: that, on his return to the heath, he met colonel Fitzroy at full gallop towards lord George; and that he (Winchingrode) followed him back in order to haſten the march of the cavalry.

Colonel Ligonier, another of the prince's aids-du-camp, depoſed, that he carried orders from the general to lord George to advance with the cavalry, in order to take advantage of the diſorder which which appeared in the enemy's cavalry: that lord George made no anſwer to theſe orders, but turning to the troops, commanded them to draw their ſwords and march: that the colonel ſeeing them advance a few paces on the right forwards, told his lordſhip that he ſhould march to the left: that, in the mean time, colonel Fitzroy arriving with orders for the Britiſh cavalry only to advance, lord George ſaid the orders were contradictory, and colonel Ligonier replied they differed only in numbers; but the deſtination of his march was the ſame, to the left.

Colonel Fitzroy, the third aid du camp to prince Ferdinand, gave evidence, that when he told lord George it was the prince's order for the Britiſh cavalry to advance towards the left, his lordſhip obſerved, that it was different from the order brought by colonel Ligonier, and he could not think the prince intended to break the line: that he aſked which way the cavalry was to march, and who was to be their guide: that when he (the aid du camp) offered to lead the column through the wood on the left, his lordſhip ſeemed ſtill diſſatisfied with the order, ſaying it did not agree with the order brought by colonel Ligonier, and deſired to be conducted in perſon to the prince, that he might have an explanation from his own mouth; a reſolution which was immediately executed. The next evidence, a colonel in the army, made oath, that, in his opinion, when the orders were delivered to lord George, his lordſhip was alarmed to a very great degree, and ſeemed to be in the utmoſt confuſion.

A certain nobleman, of high rank and unblemiſhed reputation, declared, that captain Winchingrode having told him it was abſolutely neceſſary that the cavalry ſhould march and form a line, to ſupport the foot, he had given orders to the ſecond line to march: that, as ſoon as they arrived at the place where the action began, he was met by colonel Fitzroy with an order for the cavalry to advance as faſt as poſſible: that, in marching to this place, an order came to halt, until they could be joined by the firſt line of cavalry: that afterwards, in advancing, they were again halted by lord George Sackville: that, in his opinion, they might have marched with more expedition, and even come up in time enough to act againſt the enemy: ſome other officers, who were examined on this ſubject, agreed with the marquis in theſe ſentiments.

Lord George in his defence proved, by undeniable evidence, that he never received the orders iſſued on the eve of the battle, nor any ſort of intimation or plan of action, although he was certainly intitled to ſome ſuch communication as commander in chief of the Britiſh forces; that, nevertheleſs, the orders concerning the horſes were obeyed by thoſe who received them: that lord George, inſtead of loitering or loſing time while the troops were forming, prepared to put himſelf at the head of the cavalry on the firſt notice that they were in motion: that he was ſo eager to perform his duty, as to ſet out from his quarters without even waiting for an aid du camp to attend him, and was in the field before any general officer of his diviſion: that, when captain Winchingrode delivered the order to form the cavalry in one line, making a third, to advance and ſuſtain the infantry, he neither heard him ſay he was to march by the left, nor ſaw him point with his ſword to the wood through which he was to paſs: that neither of theſe directions were obſerved by the aids du camp or officers then preſent, except one gentleman, the perſon who bore witneſs to the confuſion in the looks and deportment of his lordſhip: that the neareſt and moſt practicable way of advancing againſt the enemy was by the way of the windmill, to the left of the village of Halen: that lord George imagined this was the only way by which he could be ordered to advance: that, in this perſuaſion, he had ſent an officer to reconnoitre the village of Halen as an object of importance, as it would have been upon the flank of the cavalry in advancing forwards: that when he received the order from Winchingrode to form the line and advance, he ſtill imagined this was his route, and on this ſuppoſition immediately detached an aid du camp to remove a regiment of Saxe Gotha which was in the front: that he ſent a ſecond to obſerve the place where the infantry were, and a third to reconnoitre the enemy: that, in a few minutes, colonel Ligonier coming up with an order from prince Ferdinand to advance the cavalry, his lordſhip immediately drew his ſword, and ordered them to march forward by the windmill: that, with regard to what the colonel ſaid, that, upon his delivering the order, he added, "by the left!" lord George heard no ſuch directions; nor did it reach the ears of any other perſon then preſent except of that officer who witneſſed to the ſame direction given by Winchingrode: that immediately after the troops were put in motion, colonel Fitzroy arrived with an order from prince Ferdinand, importing, that the Britiſh cavalry only ſhould advance by the left: that lord George declared their orders were contradictory, and ſeemed the more puzzled, as he underſtood that both theſe gentlemen came off nearly at the ſame time from the prince, and were probably directed to communicate the ſame order: that it was therefore natural to ſuppoſe there was a miſtake, as there might be great danger in breaking the line, as the route by the wood appeared more difficult and tedious than that by the windmill, which led directly through open ground to the enemy; and as he could not think that if a body of horſe was immediately wanted, the general would ſend for the Britiſh that were at the fartheſt extremity of the wing, rather than for the Hanoverian cavalry, who formed the left of the line, and conſequently were much nearer the ſcene of action: that lord George in this uncertainty reſolved to apply for an explanation to the prince in perſon, who he underſtood was at a ſmall diſtance: that, with this view, he ſet out with all poſſible expedition: that having entered the wood, and perceived that the country beyond it opened ſooner to the left than he imagined, and captain Smith, his aid du camp, adviſing that the Britiſh cavalry ſhould be put in motion, he ſent back that gentleman with orders for them to advance by the left with all poſſible diſpatch: that he rode up to the general, who received him without any marks of diſpleaſure, and ordered him to bring up the whole cavalry of the right wing in a line upon the heath; an order, the reader will perceive, quite different from that which was ſo warmly eſpouſed by the aid du camp: that as the marquis of Granby had already put the ſecond line in motion, according to a ſeparate order which he had received, and the head of his column was already in view coming out of the wood, lord George thought it neceſſary to halt the troops on the left until the right ſhould come into the line, and afterwards ſend them orders to march ſlower, that two regiments which had been thrown out of the line might have an opportunity to replace themſelves in their proper ſtations.

With regard to the confuſion which one officer pretended to have perceived in the countenance and deportment of this commander, a conſiderable number of other officers then preſent, being interrogated by his lordſhip, unanimouſly declared that they ſaw no ſuch marks of confuſion, but that he delivered his orders with all the marks of coolneſs and deliberation. The candid reader will of himſelf determine, whether a man's heart is to be judged by any change of his complexion, granting ſuch a change to have happened: whether the evidence of one witneſs, in ſuch a caſe, will weigh againſt the concurrent teſtimony of all the officers, whoſe immediate buſineſs it was to attend and obſerve the commander: whether it was likely that an officer, who had been more than once in actual ſervice, and behaved without reproach, ſo as to attain ſuch an eminent rank in the army, ſhould exhibit ſymptoms of fear and confuſion, when there was in reality no appearance of danger; for none of theſe orders imported he ſhould attack the enemy, but only advance to ſuſtain the infantry.

The time which elapſed from the firſt order he received by captain Winchingrode, to the arrival of colonel Ligonier, did not exceed eight minutes, during which his aid du camp, captain Hugo, was employed in removing the Saxe Gotha regiment from the front, by which he propoſed to advance. From that period till the cavalry actually marched, in conſequence of an order from lord George, the length of time was differently eſtimated in the opinions of different witneſſes, but, at a medium, computed by the judge-advocate at fifteen minutes, during which the following circumſtances were tranſacted: the troops were firſt ordered to advance forwards, then halted; the contradictory orders arrived and were diſputed; the commander deſired the two aids du camp to agree about which was the preciſe order, and he would obey it immediately; each inſiſting upon that which he had delivered, lord George haſtened to the general for an explanation; and as he paſſed the wood, ſent back captain Smith to the right of the cavalry, which was at a conſiderable diſtance, to put the Britiſh horſe in motion.

I ſhall not pretend to determine whether the commander of ſuch an important body may be excuſeable for heſitating, when he receives contradictory orders at the ſame time, eſpecially when both orders run counter to his own judgment; whether in that caſe it is allowable for him to ſuſpend the operation for a few minutes, in order to conſult in perſon the commander in chief about a ſtep of ſuch conſequence to the preſervation of the whole army. Neither will I venture to decide dogmatically on the merits of the march, after the cavalry were put in motion; whether they marched too ſlow, or were unneceſſarily halted in their way to the heath.

It was proved indeed that lord George was always remarkably ſlow in his movements of cavalry, on the ſuppoſition that if horſes are blown, they muſt be unfit for ſervice, and that the leaſt hurry is apt to diſorder the line of horſe to ſuch a degree, as would rob them of their proper effect, and render all their efforts abortive. This being the ſyſtem of lord George Sackville, it may deſerve conſideration, whether he could deviate from it on this delicate occaſion, without renouncing the dictates of his own judgment and diſcretion; and whether he was at liberty to uſe his own judgment, after having received the order to advance.

After all, whether he was intentionally guilty, and what were the motives by which he was really actuated, are queſtions which his own conſcience alone can ſolve. Even granting him to have heſitated from perplexity; to have lingered from vexation; to have failed through error of judgment; he will probably find favour with the candid and humane part of his fellow-ſubjects, when they reflect upon the nature of his ſituation, placed at the head of ſuch a body of cavalry, uninſtructed and uninformed of plan or circumſtance, divided from the reſt of the army, unacquainted with the operations of the day, chagrined with doubt and diſappointment, and perplexed by contradictory orders, neither of which he could execute without offering violence to his own judgment; when they conſider the endeavours he uſed to manifeſt his obedience; the laſt diſtinct order, which he in perſon received and executed; that mankind are liable to miſtakes; that the cavalry were not originally intended to act, as appears in the account of the battle publiſhed at the Hague by the authority of prince Ferdinand, expreſsly declaring that the cavalry on the right did not act, becauſe it was deſtined to ſuſtain the infantry in a third line; that if it had really been deſigned for action, it ought either to have been poſted in another place, or permitted to advance ſtrait forwards by the windmill, according to the idea of its commander: finally, when they recal to view the general confuſion that ſeems to have prevailed through the manœuvres of that morning, and remember ſome particulars of the action; that the brigades of Britiſh artillery had no orders until they applied to lord George Sackville, who directed them to the ſpot where they acquitted themſelves with ſo much honour and effect, in contributing to the ſucceſs of the day; that the glory and advantage acquired by the few brigades of infantry, who may be ſaid to have defeated the whole French army, was in no reſpect owing to any general or particular orders or inſtructions, but entirely flowing from the native valour of the troops, and the ſpirited conduct of their immediate commanders; and that a great number of officers in the allied army, even of thoſe who remained on the open heath, never ſaw the face of the enemy, or ſaw them at ſuch a diſtance that they could not diſtinguiſh more than the hats and the arms of the Britiſh regiments with which they were engaged. With reſpect to the imputation of cowardice levelled at lord George by the unthinking multitude, and circulated with ſuch induſtry and clamour, we ought to conſider it as a mob-accuſation, which the braveſt of men, even the great duke of Marlborough, could not eſcape: we ought to receive it as a dangerous ſuſpicion, which ſtrikes at the root of character, and may blaſt that honour in a moment, which the ſoldier has acquired in a long courſe of painful ſervice, at the continual hazard of his life: we ought to diſtruſt it as a malignant charge, altogether inconſiſtent with the former conduct of the perſon accuſed, as well as with his ſubſequent impatience and perſeverance in demanding a trial, to which he never would have been called; a trial which, tho' his life was at ſtake, and his cauſe out of countenance, he ſuſtained with ſuch courage, fortitude, and preſence of mind, as even his enemies themſelves could not help admiring. It ought likewiſe to be obſerved in his favour, that the only perſon who witneſſed to the confuſion in his countenance, and of conſequence may be ſuppoſed to have been the author of this malicious report, was himſelf guilty of the very ſame diſobedience to orders of which he accuſed his ſuperior; and the intelligent reader will, from this circumſtance, judge what credit is due to the evidence of ſuch a witneſs, eſpecially when contradicted by the concurrent teſtimony of ſo many other gentlemen.

The court-martial, however, having examined the evidence, and heard the defence, gave judgment in theſe words: "The court, upon due conſideration of the whole matter before them, is of opinion, that lord George Sackville is guilty of having diſobeyed the orders of prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, whom he was by his commiſſion and inſtructions directed to obey as commander in chief, according to the rules of war; and it is the farther opinion of this court, that lord George Sackville is, and he is hereby adjudged, unfit to ſerve his majeſty in any military capacity whatſoever." This ſentence was confirmed by the king, who moreover ſignified his pleaſure, that it ſhould be given out in public orders, not only in Britain, but in America, and every quarter of the globe where any Engliſh troops happened to be, that officers, being convinced that neither high birth nor great employmenis can ſhelter offences of ſuch a nature; and that ſeeing they are ſubject to cenſures, much worſe than death to a man who has any ſenſe of honour, they may avoid the fatal conſequences ariſing from diſobedience of orders. To complete the diſgrace of this unfortunate general, his majeſty in council called for the council-book, and ordered the name of lord George Sackville to be ſtruck out of the liſt of privy-counſellors.

This trial was ſucceeded by another of a ſtill more important nature. Laurence Shirley, earl Ferrers, a nobleman of a violent ſpirit, who had committed many outrages, and, in the opinion of all who knew him, given manifold proofs of inſanity, at length perpetrated a murder which ſubjected him to the cognizance of the law. His deportment to his lady was ſo brutal, that application had been made to the houſe of peers, and a ſeparation effected by act of parliament. Truſtees were nominated; and one Mr. Johnſon, who had, during the beſt part of his life, been employed in the family, was now appointed receiver of the eſtates, at the earl's own requeſt. The conduct of this man in the courſe of his ſtewardſhip gave umbrage to lord Ferrers, whoſe diſpoſition was equally jealous and vindictive. He imagined all his own family had conſpired againſt his intereſt, and that Johnſon was one of their accomplices; that he had been inſtrumental in obtaining the act of parliament, which his lordſhip conſidered as a grievous hardſhip; that he had diſappointed him in regard to a certain contract about coal-mines: in a word, that there was a colluſion between Johnſon and the earl's adverſaries. Inflamed with theſe ſuppoſitions, he firſt expreſſed his reſentment by giving Johnſon notice to quit the farm which he poſſeſſed on the eſtate; but finding the truſtees had confirmed the leaſe, he determined to gratify his revenge by aſſaſſination, and laid his plan accordingly.

On Sunday the thirteenth of January he appointed this unhappy man to come to his houſe on the Friday following, in order to peruſe papers, or ſettle accompts; and Johnſon went thither without the leaſt ſuſpicion of what was prepared for his reception: for although he was no ſtranger to his lordſhip's dangerous diſpoſition, and knew he had ſome time before incurred his diſpleaſure, yet he imagined his reſentment had entirely ſubſided, as the earl had of late behaved to him with remarkable complacency. He therefore at the time appointed repaired to his lordſhip's houſe of Stanton in Leiceſterſhire, at the diſtance of a ſhort mile from his own habitation, and was admitted by a maid ſervant. The earl had diſmiſſed every perſon in the houſe, upon various pretences, except three women who were left in the kitchen. Johnſon advancing to the door of the apartment, was received by his lordſhip, who deſired him to walk into another room, where he joined him in a few minutes, and then the door was locked on the inſide. After a great deal of warm expoſtulation, the earl inſiſted upon his ſubſcribing a paper, confeſſing himſelf a villain; and on his refuſing to comply with this demand, declared he would put him to death. In vain the unfortunate man remonſtrated againſt this cruel reſolution, and deprecated the indignation of this furious nobleman. He remained deaf to all his intreaties, drew forth a piſtol which he had loaded for the purpoſe, and commanding him to implore heaven's mercy on his knees, ſhot him through the body while he remained in that ſupplicating poſture. The conſequence of this violence was not immediate death; but his lordſhip ſeeing the wretched victim ſtill alive and ſenſible, though agonized with pain, felt a momentary emotion of pity. He ordered his ſervants to convey Mr. Johnſon up ſtairs to a bed, to ſend for a ſurgeon, and give immediate notice of the accident to the wounded man's family. When Mr. Johnſon's daughter came to the houſe, ſhe was met by the earl, who told her he had ſhot her father on purpoſe, and with deliberation.

The ſame declaration he made to the ſurgeon at his arrival. He ſtood by him while he examined the wound, deſcribed the direction of the ball, and ſeemed ſurpriſed that it had not penetrated through the body. When he demanded the ſurgeon's opinion of the wound, the operator thought proper to temporize, for his own ſafety as well as for the ſake of the public, leſt the earl ſhould take ſome other deſperate ſtep, or endeavour to eſcape. He therefore amuſed him with hopes of Johnſon's recovery, about which he now ſeemed extremely anxious. He ſupported his ſpirits by immoderate drinking, after having retired to another apartment with the ſurgeon, whom he deſired to take all poſſible care of his patient. He declared, however, that he did not repent of what he had done; that Johnſon was a villain, who deſerved to die; that in caſe of his death he (the earl) would ſurrender himſelf to the houſe of peers, and take his trial. He ſaid he could juſtify the action to his own conſcience; and owned his intention was to have killed Johnſon outright; but as he ſtill ſurvived, and was in pain, he deſired that all poſſible means might be uſed for his recovery.

Nor did he ſeem altogether neglectful of his own ſafety: he endeavoured to tamper with the ſurgeon, and enquired what evidence he would give when called before a court of juſtice. He continued to drink himſelf into a ſtate of intoxication, and all the cruelty of his hate ſeemed to return. He would not allow the wounded man to be removed to his own houſe, ſaying, he would keep him under his own roof that he might plague the villain. He returned to the chamber where Johnſon lay, inſulted him with the moſt opprobrious language, threatened to ſhoot him through the head, and could hardly be reſtrained from committing further acts of violence on the poor man, who was already in extremity. After he retired to bed, the ſurgeon procured a ſufficient number of aſſiſtants, who conveyed Mr. Johnſon in an eaſy chair to his own houſe, where he expired about nine in the morning. The ſame ſurgeon aſſembled a number of armed men to ſeize the murderer, who at firſt threatened reſiſtance, but was ſoon apprehended, endeavouring to make his eſcape, and committed to the county priſon. From thence he was conveyed to London by the gaoler of Leiceſter, and conducted by the uſher of the black rod and his deputy into the houſe of lords, where the coroner's inqueſt, and the affidavits touching the murder being read, the gaoler delivered up his priſoner to the care of the black rod, and he was immediately committed to the Tower. He appeared very calm, compoſed, and unconcerned, from the time of his being apprehended; converſed cooly on the ſubject of his impriſonment; made very pertinent remarks upon the nature of the habeas corpus act of parliament, of which he hoped to avail himſelf; and when they withdrew from the houſe of peers, deſired he might not be viſited by any of his relations or acquaintances. His underſtanding, which was naturally good, had been well cultivated; his arguments were rational, but his conduct was frantic.

The circumſtances of this aſſaſſination appeared ſo cruel and deliberate, that the people cried aloud for juſtice; and the government gave up the offender to the laws of his country. The lord-keeper Henley was appointed lord high ſteward for the trial of earl Ferrers, and ſat in ſtate with all the peers and judges in Weſtminſter-hall, which was for this purpoſe converted into a very auguſt tribunal. On the ſixteenth day of April the delinquent was brought from the Tower in a coach, attended by the major of the Tower, the gentleman-gaoler, the wardours, and a detachment of the foot-guards. He was brought into court about ten; and the lord ſteward with the peers taking their places, he was arraigned aloud, in the midſt of an infinite multitude of people, including many foreigners, who ſeemed wonderfully ſtruck with the grandeur and magnificence of the ſcene. The murder was fully proved by unqueſtionable evidence: but the earl pleaded inſanity of mind; and, in order to make good this plea, called many witneſſes to atteſt his lunacy in a variety of inſtances, which ſeemed too plainly to indicate a diſordered imagination: unfounded jealouſy of plots and conſpiracies, unconnected ravings, fits of muſing, incoherent ejaculations, ſudden ſtarts of fury, denunciations of unprovoked revenge, frantic geſticulations, and a ſtrange caprice of temper, were proved to have diſtinguiſhed his conduct and deportment.

It appeared that lunacy had been a family taint, and affected ſeveral of his lordſhip's relations; that one of them in particular, a ſolicitor of reputation, had renounced his buſineſs, on the full perſuaſion of his being diſordered in his brain; that, long before this unhappy event, his neareſt relations had deliberated upon the expediency of taking out a commiſſion of lunacy againſt him, and were prevented by no other conſideration than the fear of being ſued for ſcandalum magnatum, ſhould the jury find his lordſhip compos mentis; a circumſtance which in all probability would have happened, inaſmuch as the earl's madneſs did not appear in his converſation, but in his conduct. A phyſician of eminence, whoſe practice was confined to perſons labouring under this infirmity, declared that the particulars of the earl's deportment, and perſonal behaviour, ſeemed to indicate lunacy. Indeed, all his neighbours and acquaintance had long conſidered him as a madman; and a certain noble lord is ſaid to have declared in the houſe of peers, when the bill of ſeparation was on the carpet, that he looked upon him in the light of a maniac; and that, if ſome effectual ſtep was not taken to deprive him of the power of doing miſchief, he did not doubt but that they would one day have occaſion to try him for murder.

The lawyers for the crown endeavoured to invalidate the proofs of his lunacy, by obſerving, that his lordſhip was never ſo much deprived of his reaſon but that he could diſtinguiſh between good and evil: that the murder he had committed was the effect of revenge, for a conceived injury of ſome ſtanding: that the malice was deliberate, and the plan artfully conducted: that immediately after the deed was perpetrated, the earl's converſation and reaſoning was cool and conſiſtent, until he drank himſelf into a ſtate of intoxication: that, in the opinion of the greateſt lawyers, no criminal can avail himſelf of the plea of lunacy, provided the crime was committed during a lucid interval; but his lordſhip, far from exhibiting any marks of inſanity, had, in the courſe of his trial, diſplayed uncommon underſtanding and ſagacity in examining the witneſſes, and making many ſhrewd and pertinent obſervations on the evidence which was given.

Theſe ſentiments coincided with the opinion of the peers, who unanimouſly declared him guilty. The trial laſted two days; and on the third the lord-ſteward, after having made a ſhort ſpeech concerning the heinous nature of the offence, pronounced the ſame ſentence of death upon the earl which malefactors of the loweſt claſs undergo; namely, that from the Tower, in which he was impriſoned, he ſhould, on the Monday following, be led to the common place of execution, there to be hanged by the neck, and his body be afterwards diſſected and anatomized. This laſt part of

of the ſentence ſeemed to ſhock the criminal extremely; he changed colour, his jaw quivered, and he appeared to be in great agitation; but during the remaining part of his life he behaved with ſurpriſing compoſure, and even unconcern. After he had received ſentence, the lords his judges, by a power veſted in them, reſpited his execution for one month, that he might have time to ſettle his temporal and ſpiritual concerns.

Before ſentence was paſſed, the earl read a paper, in which he begged pardon of their lordſhips for the trouble he had given, as well as for having, againſt his own inclination, pleaded lunacy at the requeſt of his friends. He thanked them for the candid trial with which he had been indulged, and intreated their lordſhips to recommend him to the king for mercy. He afterwards ſent a letter to his majeſty, remonſtrating, that he was the repreſentative of a very ancient and honourable family, which had been allied to the crown; and requeſting that, if he could not be favoured with the ſpecies of death which in caſes of treaſon diſtinguiſhes the nobleman from the plebeian, he might at leaſt, out of conſideration of his family, be allowed to ſuffer in the Tower, rather than at the common place of execution: but this indulgence was refuſed. From his return to the Tower, to the day of his execution, he betrayed no mark of apprehenſion or impatience; but regulated his affairs with preciſion, and converſed without concern or reſtraint.

On the fifth day of May, his body being demanded by the ſheriffs at the Tower-gate, in conſequence of a writ under the great ſeal of England, directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, his lordſhip deſired permiſſion to go in his own landau, and appeared gaily dreſſed in a light-coloured ſuit of cloaths, embroidered with ſilver. He was attended in the landau by Mr. ſheriff Vaillant and the chaplain of the Tower, followed by the chariots of the ſheriffs, a mourning coach and ſix filled with his friends, and a hearſe for the conveyance of his body. He was guarded by a poſſe of conſtables, a party of horſe grenadiers, and a detachment of infantry; and in this manner the proceſſion moved from the Tower, through an infinite concourſe of people, to Tyburn, where the gallows, and a ſcaffold erected under it, appeared covered with black bays. The earl behaved with great compoſure to Mr. ſheriff Vaillant: he obſerved, that the gaiety of his apparel might ſeem odd on ſuch an occaſion; but that he had particular reaſons for wearing that ſuit of cloaths: he took notice of the vaſt multitude which crouded around him, brought thither, he ſuppoſed, by curioſity to ſee a nobleman hanged: he told the ſheriff he had applied to the king by letter, that he might be permitted to die in the Tower, where the earl of Eſſex, one of his anceſtors, had been beheaded in the reign of queen Elizabeth; an indulgence which, he ſaid, he had the greater reaſon to hope would be granted, as he had the honour to quarter part of his majeſty's arms. He expreſſed ſome diſpleaſure at being executed as a common felon, expoſed to the eyes of ſuch a multitude.

The chaplain, who had never been admitted to him before, obſerving that ſome account of his lordſhip's ſentiments on religion would be expected by the public, he made anſwer, that he did not think himſelf accountable to the public for his private ſentiments: that he had always adored one God, the creator of the univerſe; and, with reſpect to any particular opinions of his own, he had never propagated them, or endeavoured to make proſelytes; becauſe he thought it was criminal to diſturb the eſtabliſhed religion of his country, as lord Bolingbroke had done by the publication of his writings. He added, that the great number of ſects, and the multiplication of religious diſputes, had almoſt baniſhed morality. With regard to the crime for which he ſuffered, he declared that he had no malice againſt Mr. Johnſon; and that the murder was owing to a perturbation of mind, occaſioned by a variety of croſſes and vexations. When he approached the place of execution, he expreſſed an earneſt deſire to ſee and take leave of a certain perſon who waited in a coach; a perſon, he ſaid, for whom he had the moſt ſincere regard and affection; but the ſheriff prudently ſuggeſting that ſuch an interview might unman him, at a time when he had occaſion for all his fortitude and reſolution, he acquieſced in the juſtneſs of the remark, and delivered to him a pocket-book, a ring, and a purſe, deſiring they might be given to that perſon, whom he now declined ſeeing.

On his arrival at Tyburn he came out of the landau, and aſcended the ſcaffold with a firm ſtep and undaunted countenance. He refuſed to join the chaplain in his devotions; but, kneeling with him on black cuſhions, he repeated the Lord's Prayer, which he ſaid he had always admired; and added with great energy, "O Lord, forgive me all my errors, pardon all my ſins." After this exerciſe, he preſented his watch to Mr. ſheriff Vaillant, thanked him and the other gentlemen for all their civilities; and ſignified his deſire of being buried at Breden, or Stanton, in Leiceſterſhire. Finally, he gratified the executioner with a purſe of money; then the halter being adjuſted to his neck, he ſtepped upon a little ſtage, erected upon ſprings, on the middle of the ſcaffold; and, the cap being pulled over his eyes, the ſheriff made a ſignal, at which the ſtage fell from under his feet, and left him ſuſpended in the air. His body having hung an hour and five minutes, was cut down, placed in the hearſe, and conveyed to the public theatre for diſſection, where being opened, and lying for ſome days as the ſubject of a public lecture, at length it was carried off and privately interred.

In the month of Auguſt a remarkable act of deſperate revenge was perpetrated by one Stirn, a native of Heſſe Caſſel, inflamed and exaſperated by a falſe punctilio of honour. This unhappy young man was deſcended of a good family, and poſſeſſed many accompliſhments both of body and mind; but his character was diſtinguiſhed by ſuch a jealous ſenſibility, as rendered him unhappy in himſelf, and diſagreeable to his companions. After having lived for ſome years as uſher in a boarding-ſchool, he was admitted into the houſe of one Mr. Matthews, a ſurgeon, in order to teach him the claſſics, and inſtruct his children in muſic, which he perfectly underſtood. He had not long reſided in this family, when the ſurgeon took umbrage at ſome part of his conduct, taxed him roughly with fraud and ingratitude, and inſiſted upon his removing to another lodging. Whether he rejected this intimation, or found difficulty in procuring another apartment, the ſurgeon reſolved to expel him by violence, called in the aſſiſtance of a peace officer, and turned him out into the ſtreet in the night, after having loaded him with the moſt provoking reproaches.

Theſe injuries and diſgraces operating upon a mind jealous by nature, and galled by adverſity, produced a kind of phrenzy of reſentment; and he took the deſperate reſolution of ſacrificing Matthews to his revenge. Next day, having procured a caſe of piſtols, and charged them for the occaſion, he reinforced his rage by drinking an unuſual quantity of wine, and repaired in the evening to a public houſe which Mr. Matthews frequented, in the neighbourhood of Hatton Garden. There he accordingly found the unhappy victim ſitting with ſome of his friends; and the ſurgeon, inſtead of palliating his former conduct, began to inſult him afreſh, ſaying he was a dirty fellow, and that he ought to be ſent back to his own louſy country. Stirn, exaſperated by this additional indignity, pulled his piſtols from his boſom, ſhot the ſurgeon, who immediately expired, and diſcharged the other at his own breaſt, though his confuſion was ſuch that he miſſed of his aim. He was apprehended on the ſpot, and conveyed to priſon, where for ſome days he refuſed all kind of ſuſtenance, but afterwards became more compoſed. At his trial he pleaded inſanity of mind; but being found guilty, he reſolved to anticipate the execution of the ſentence. That ſame evening he drank poiſon; and notwithſtanding all the remedies that could be adminiſtered, died in ſtrong convulſions. His body was publicly diſſected, according to the ſentence of the law, and afterwards interred with thoſe marks of indignity which are reſerved for the perpetrators of ſuicide. It does not appear what reaſon Matthews had for accuſing Stirn of the crimes which he laid to his charge; but Stirn ſolemnly declared in his laſt moments that there was none. He expreſſed many obligations to one Mr. Crawford, with whom he had lived as uſher, and who often viſited him in priſon with great kindneſs and humanity. He was poſſeſſed of good natural parts, improved by an excellent education; and perhaps, had he been in a condition more ſuitable not only to his hopes, but to his birth and merit, he would have been leſs jealous of affronts; and, conſcious of undiſputed dignity, would have treated rudeneſs and ſlander with contempt, inſtead of purſuing them with revenge.

In the month of October the attention of the public was ſtrongly engaged by a private, but intereſting event, namely, the death of one Miſs Bell, an unfortunate young creature of a good family, who had renounced her father's houſe, and embraced the wretched life of a common proſtitute. She died at a lodging-houſe in Marybone, having declared on her death-bed to an officer of her acquaintance, who viſited her from a motive of humanity, that ſhe had received her death's wound at a bagnio from a certain young gentleman, who ſeemed to have mangled her out of meer wantonneſs of brutality. She not only perſiſted in repeating this declaration before divers perſons, but conjured the officer to ſee juſtice done upon the villain who had treated her ſo inhumanly. Her complaint was corroborated by the aſſeveration of her own maid and attendant, who bore witneſs to her being wounded in two different places. Theſe circumſtances made ſuch an impreſſion upon the gentleman, that he applied to a juſtice of the peace, and obtained an order for taking up her body after ſhe was buried, that it might be ſubjected to the cognizance of the coroner and his inqueſt; it accordingly underwent an examination, and was reinterred, after the jury had given their verdict that ſhe died a natural death.

The officer, who, though in attendance, had not been examined, was not ſatisfied with this deciſion, and reſolved to promote a further enquiry: he wrote to the young woman's father, as well as to the perſon accuſed, who had retired to the country, and declared that he would ſubmit himſelf to a fair trial, that his character might be vindicated to the ſatisfaction of the public. Accordingly, when the father commenced a proſecution, he ſurrendered himſelf before five juſtices of the peace in Weſtminſter, who having examined a great number of witneſſes, were of opinion that the warrant ſhould be diſcharged. As a pamphlet, containing an account of the death of Miſs Bell, had been publiſhed, and without doubt given a bad impreſſion of this gentleman, he proſecuted the officer in the King's Bench for having publiſhed a libel againſt him; but the information was ſet aſide, and the judge ordered the proſecutor to be tried at the Old Bailey for murder. He was brought to the bar of that tribunal in the month of February, and, after a long hearing, acquitted. By part of the evidence it appeared there was reaſon to believe the unfortunate deceaſed was actually delirious when ſhe made the complaint to the officer: the nurſe contradicted the evidence of that gentleman: the ſervants of the bagnio declared that no wounds had been given at the time when the tragedy was ſaid to have been acted: the apothecary who attended her in her laſt moments affirmed, that the wounds could not be the cauſe of her death, but actually preſerved her from dying of a mortification; and the phyſician gave it as his opinion, that the ſuppoſed wounds were no other than abſceſſes, formed by an effort of nature to relieve itſelf. Had they really been wounds, there would be little reaſon to ſuppoſe they were the immediate cauſe of her death, as no conſiderable veſſel had been hurt, nor any of the bowels injured; but, that the infliction of ſuch wounds, co-operating with other acts of barbarity, blows, ſtripes, and bruiſes, might in a body incenſed with rage, and inflamed with intoxication, produce a fever that would terminate in death, is a poſſibility to which every judicious phyſician muſt ſubſcribe; and in that caſe, he who inflicted the wounds and bruiſes, who arouſed the reſentment, and promoted the intoxication of the deceaſed, cannot juſtly be pronounced innocent of her death. The perſon, however, accuſed of the murder, was finally acquitted, though by no means to the ſatisfaction of the public.

The royal ſociety having made application to the king, repreſenting that there would be a tranſit of Venus over the diſk of the ſun, on the ſixth day of June; and that there was reaſon to hope the parallax of that planet might be more accurately determined by making proper obſervations of this phænomenon at the iſland of St. Helena, near the coaſt of Africa, and at Bencoolen in the Eaſt Indies; his majeſty granted a ſum of money to defray the expence of ſending able aſtronomers to theſe two places, and ordered a ſhip of war to be equipped for their conveyance. Accordingly, Mr. Nevil Maſkelyne and Mr. Robert Waddington were appointed to make the obſervations at St. Helena; and Mr. Charles Maſon and Mr. Jeremiah Dixon undertook the voyage to Bencoolen on the iſland of Sumatra †.

I ſhall conclude the domeſtic occurrences of this year with an account of two incidents, which, tho' of a very different nature in reſpect of each other, concurred nevertheleſs in demonſtrating that the internal wealth and vigour of the nation were neither drained nor diminiſhed by the enormous expence and inconveniencies of the war. The committee appointed to manage the undertaking for a new bridge over the river Thames at Blackfriars having received and examined a variety of plans, preſented by different artiſts, at length gave the preference to the deſign of one Mr. Mylne, a young architect, a native of North Britain, juſt returned from the proſecution of his ſtudies at Rome, where he had gained the prize in the Capitol, which the academy of that city beſtows on him who produces the moſt beautiful and uſeful plan on a given ſubject of architecture. This young man being at London, in his return to his own country, was adviſed to declare himſelf a candidate for the ſuperintendency of the new bridge; and the plan which he preſented was approved and adopted. The place being already aſcertained, the lord-mayor of London, accompanied by the committee and a great concourſe of people, repaired to Blackfriars, and laid the firſt ſtone of the bridge, placing upon it a plate with an inſcription, which does more honour to the public ſpirit of the undertakers than to the claſſical taſte of the author.

The other inſtance that denoted the wealth and ſpirit of the nation, was the indifference and unconcern with which they bore the loſs of a vaſt magazine of naval ſtores, belonging to the dock-yard at Portſmouth, which in the month of July was ſet on fire by lightning, and being compoſed of combuſtibles, burned with ſuch fury, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the workmen in the yard, the ſailors in the harbour, and the troops in the town, that before a ſtop was put to the conflagration, it had deſtroyed a variety of ſtores, to an immenſe value. The damage, however, was ſo immediately repaired, that it had no ſort of effect in diſconcerting any plan, or even in retarding any naval preparation.

† In the beginning of April the king granted to his grandſon, prince Edward-Auguſtus, and to the heirs-male of his royal highneſs, the dignities of duke of the kingdom of Great Britain, and of earl of the kingdom of Ireland, by the names, ſtiles, and titles, of duke of York and Albany, and of earl of Ulſter.

GEORGE III. A. D. 1760.

THE deceaſe of his late majeſty was no ſooner known than Mr. Pitt, one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, repaired to Kew, and communicated the tidings to his new ſovereign, George the Third, who thus aſcended the throne in the twenty-third year of his age. The lords of the privy-council were immediately aſſembled; and next day his majeſty was proclaimed before Saville-houſe in Leiceſter-fields, in preſence of the great officers of ſtate, the nobility, the lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and a great number of perſons of diſtinction. The ſame ceremony was performed, with the uſual ſolemnities, in different parts of the capital, which reſounded with joy and acclamation.

The council being aſſembled at Charlton-houſe, the king addreſſed himſelf to them in the following terms: "The loſs that I and the nation have ſuffered by the death of the king my grandfather, would have been ſeverely felt at any time; but coming at ſo critical a juncture, and ſo unexpected, it is by many circumſtances augmented; and the weight now falling upon me, much increaſed, I feel my own inſufficiency to ſupport it as I wiſh: but animated by the tendereſt affection for this my native country, and depending on the advice, experience, and abilities of your lordſhips, the ſupport and aſſiſtance of every honeſt man, I enter with chearfulneſs into this arduous ſituation, and ſhall make it the buſineſs of my life to promote, in every thing, the glory and happineſs of theſe kingdoms; to preſerve and ſtrengthen the conſtitution, both in church and ſtate; and as I mount the throne in the midſt of an expenſive, but juſt and neceſſary war, I ſhall endeavour to proſecute it in the manner the moſt likely to bring about an honourable and laſting peace, in concert with my allies." This declaration implying a reſolution to proſecute the ſame meaſures which had been planned under the late king, was publiſhed at the requeſt of the lords aſſembled in council, and effectually quelled the apprehenſions of all thoſe who dreaded an alteration.

His majeſty now took and ſigned the oath relating to the ſecurity of the church of Scotland, and ſubſcribed two inſtruments thereof, in preſence of the lords of council, by whom they were witneſſed. One of thoſe was tranſmitted to the court of ſeſſions, to be recorded in the books of Sederunt, and afterwards lodged in the public regiſter of Scotland; the other remained among the records of the council. The two houſes of parliament being aſſembled, the members were ſworn in; the peers by the lord-keeper; the commons before the duke duke of Rutland, lord--ſteward: after which both houſes were adjourned.

The firſt ſpecimen which his majeſty gave of his excellent diſpoſition, was a proclamation which he iſſued for the encouragement of piety and virtue, and the preventing and puniſhing of vice, profaneneſs, and immorality. It was expreſſed in the following terms: "We moſt ſeriouſly and religiouſly conſidering, that it is an indiſpenſible duty on us to be careful, above all other things, to preſerve and advance the honour and ſervice of Almighty God, and to diſcourage all vice, profaneneſs, debauchery, and immorality, which are ſo highly diſpleaſing to God, ſo great a reproach to our religion and government, and, by means of the frequent ill examples of the practices thereof, have ſo fatal a tendency to the corruption of many of our loving ſubjects, otherwiſe religiouſly and virtuouſly diſpoſed; and which, if not timely remedied, may juſtly draw down the Divine vengeance on us and our kingdoms. We alſo humbly acknowledging, that we cannot expect the bleſſing and goodneſs of Almighty God (by whom kings reign, and on which we entirely rely) to make our reign happy and proſperous to ourſelves and to our people, without a religious obſervance of God's holy laws: to the intent therefore, that religion, piety, and good manners, may, according to our moſt hearty deſire, flouriſh and increaſe under our adminiſtration and government, we have thought fit, by the advice of our privy-council, to iſſue this our royal proclamation, and do hereby declare our royal purpoſe and reſolution to diſcountenance and puniſh all manner of vice, profaneneſs, and immorality, in all perſons, of whatſoever degree or quality, within this our realm, and particularly in ſuch as are employed near our royal perſon; and that, for the encouragement of religion and morality, we will upon all occaſions diſtinguiſh perſons of piety and virtue, by marks of our royal favour. And we do expect and require, that all perſons of honour, or in place of authority, will give good example by their virtue and piety, and to their utmoſt contribute to the diſcountenancing perſons of diſſolute and debauched lives, that they, being reduced by that means to ſhame and contempt, for their looſe and evil actions and behaviour, may be thereby alſo enforced the ſooner to reform their ill habits and practices, and that the viſible diſpleaſure of good men towards them may, as far as it is poſſible, ſupply what the laws probably cannot altogether prevent. And we do hereby ſtrictly enjoin and prohibit all our loving ſubjects, of what degree or quality ſoever, from playing on the Lord's day at dice, cards, or any other game whatever, either in public or private houſes, or any other places whatſoever; and we do hereby require and command them, and every of them, decently and reverently to attend the worſhip of God on every Lord's day, on pain of our higheſt diſpleaſure, and of being proceeded againſt with the utmoſt rigour that may be by law. And for the more effectual reforming all ſuch perſons who, by reaſon of their diſſolute lives and converſations, are a ſcandal to our kingdom, our further pleaſure is, and we do hereby ſtrictly charge and command all our judges, mayors, ſheriffs, juſtices of the peace, and all other our officers and miniſters, both eccleſiaſtical and civil, and all other our ſubjects whom it may concern, to be very vigilant and ſtrict in the diſcovery, and the effectual proſecution and puniſhment of all perſons who ſhall be guilty of exceſſive drinking, blaſphemy, profane ſwearing and curſing, lewdneſs, profanation of the Lord's day, or other diſſolute, immoral, or diſorderly practices; and that they take care alſo effectually to ſuppreſs all public gaming-houſes and places, and other lewd and diſorderly houſes, and to put in execution the ſtatute made in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of the late king Charles II. entitled, An act for the better obſervation of the Lord's day commonly called Sunday: and alſo an act of parliament made in the ninth year of the reign of the late king William III. intitled, An act for the more effectual ſuppreſſing of blaſphemy and profaneneſs; and all other laws now in force for the puniſhing and ſuppreſſing any of the vices aforeſaid; and alſo to ſuppreſs and prevent all gaming whatſoever, in public or private houſes, on the Lord's day; and likewiſe that they take effectual care to prevent all perſons keeping taverns, chocolate-houſes, coffee-houſes, or other public houſes whatſoever, from ſelling wine, chocolate, coffee, ale, beer, or other liquors, or receiving or permitting gueſts to be or remain in ſuch their houſes in the time of divine ſervice on the Lord's day, as they will anſwer it to Almighty God, and upon pain of our higheſt diſpleaſure. And for the more effectual proceeding herein, we alſo hereby direct and command all our judges of aſſizes, and juſtices of the peace, to give ſtrict charges at their reſpective aſſizes and ſeſſions, for the due proſecution and puniſhment of all perſons that ſhall preſume to offend in any of the kinds aforeſaid; and alſo of all perſons that, contrary to their duty, ſhall be remiſs or negligent in putting the laws in execution; and that they do at their reſpective aſſizes and quarter-ſeſſions of the peace, cauſe this our royal proclamation to be publicly read in open court, immediately before the charge is given. And we do hereby further charge and command every miniſter in his reſpective pariſh-church or chapel, to read, or cauſe to be read, this our proclamation, at leaſt four times in every year, immediately after divine ſervice, and to incite and ſtir up their reſpective auditors to the practice of piety and virtue, and the avoiding of all immorality and profaneneſs. And to the end that all vice and debauchery may be prevented, and religion and virtue practiſed by all officers, private ſoldiers, mariners, and others, who are employed in our ſervice by ſea and land, we do hereby ſtrictly charge and command all our commanders and officers whatſoever, that they do take care to avoid all profaneneſs, debauchery, and other immoralities; and that, by their own good and virtuous lives and converſations, they do ſet good examples to all ſuch as are under their care and authority; and likewiſe take care of and inſpect the behaviour of all ſuch as are under them, and puniſh all thoſe who ſhall be guilty of any offences aforeſaid, as they will be anſwerable for the ill conſequences of their neglect herein. Given, &c"

This proclamation was immediately ſucceeded by another, requiring all perſons who were in offices of authority or government, at the deceaſe of the late king, to proceed in the execution of their reſpective offices. The tide of affection towards the

the young monarch began to run ſo high, that addreſſes, couched in the warmeſt profeſſions of love and attachment, flowed in from every part of the kingdom.' The magiſtrates of London led the way; and their example was followed by the merchants and traders of that city, amounting to ſuch a number as had never before appeared on the like occaſion. The clergy of London and Weſtminſter, headed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, payed their compliments to his majeſty on his acceſſion to the throne; and the two univerſities were not ſlow in preſenting their addreſſes of congratulation. In a word, all the bodies politic and corporate, in all the cities and counties of the three kingdoms ſeemed to vie with each other in expreſſions of loyalty and affection to their new ſovereign, who received them with ſuch affability and marks of regard as could not but be extremely pleaſing to a people remarkable for ſenſibility and ſentiment.

On the tenth day of November, in the evening, the body of the late king was removed from Kenſington to the apartment called the Prince's Chamber, near the houſe of peers, where it lay in ſtate until next night, when it was interred with great funeral pomp, in the royal vault in the chapel of Henry the Seventh, adjoining to Weſtminſter-abbey, the duke of Cumberland appearing in the character of chief mourner. Theſe laſt duties to the deceaſed monarch being piouſly diſcharged, the eyes of the people were turned upon their youthful ſovereign, who, ſome hoped, and many apprehended, would ſoon embrace a new ſyſtem of politics. Nor did the different parties which had been ſo long ſilenced, and now began to revive in the nation, fail to recommend their favourite plans by every kind of argument and topic.

The grand conteſt which divided the two factions was, whether it was uſeful or expedient to adhere to our German connections. The enemies of theſe meaſures alleged, that by perſiſting in ſuch a conduct, we evidently purſued a ſyſtem by which we muſt loſe all the advantages we acquired during the ſhort time we followed one that was more rational and ſuitable to our circumſtances; a ſyſtem of all others the moſt abſurd; a ſyſtem, in which defeats were attended with their uſual fatal effects, and in which even victory itſelf could not ſave us from ruin: that, not to enter into that long and vainly agitated queſtion, whether we ought to take any part in the differences which may ariſe between the powers on the continent? this diſquiſition being foreign to the preſent purpoſe, and beſides, being of too vague and general a nature to admit of any preciſe determination; this much might be aſſerted, that we could never engage in a continental war againſt France, without a concurrence in our favour of all the other powers on the continent: that this was the continental ſcheme of the great king William; and this principle the foundation of the grand alliance, which he projected, and at the head of which, in defence of the liberties of Europe, he made the moſt auguſt appearance to which any monarch had ever been raiſed: that it was on this principle, in conjunction with half Europe, that we carried on the war with ſo much honour and ſucceſs againſt France, under the great duke of Marlborough; but to engage in a continental war with that power, not only unaſſiſted, but oppoſed by the greateſt part of thoſe ſtates with whom we were then combined, was an attempt never to be juſtified by any comparative calculation of the populouſneſs, the revenues, or the general ſtrength of the two nations; it was a deſperate ſtruggle, which muſt finally end in our ruin. What, they aſked, was the ſcene which we had choſen for this ſtruggle? We have choſen Germany, they ſaid; the very ſpot which, of all others, the French, if they had their choice, would have pointed out to us. That, by making Germany the theatre of war, they ſaw that country waſted and deſtroyed, the ſtrength of which had always proved the greateſt bulwark againſt their inſatiable ambition: that they ſaw the ſwords of the Germans, through the whole extent of that vaſt and populous country, turned againſt each other; and they beheld with joy the Engliſh, whoſe intereſt it was to ſave them as much as poſſible, cooperating with their blood and treaſures to complete the diſunion, and conſequently the deſolation of Germany. That, in a war in that country, France has many advantages: ſhe ſupports her armies, in a great degree, by pillaging thoſe whom, in every reſpect, it is her intereſt to weaken: ſhe is not very remote from her own frontiers, from whence ſhe is eaſily provided, eaſily recruited; and by means of which a great part of the public money is expended in the country where it is raiſed. Is ſhe unſucceſsful? ſhe is brought thereby but the nearer to her frontier, ſupports her troops with ſtill the greater facility, and exhauſts ſtill leſs the natural wealth of her people: that even ſuppoſing the French army driven into France, theſe very advantages are conſiderably encreaſed; and many obvious circumſtances render it impoſſible for the allied army to puſh their ſucceſs againſt France, on the ſide of Germany, to any deciſive conſequence. That to the Engliſh, on the contrary, every thing is unfavourable in ſuch a war; their greateſt ſucceſſes will only carry them to a greater diſtance from their reſources, and every ſtep of their progreſs muſt make the tranſport of proviſion, artillery, ammunition, and the numerous and almoſt infinite neceſſaries of a large army more difficult, and in the end altogether impracticable: that this was not vain ſpeculation, the events which followed the battle of Crevelt, had ſufficiently proved; prince Ferdinand, victorious in that action, was obliged, rather from the difficulty of ſubſiſting than the ſuperiority of the enemy, to repaſs the Rhine, and to bring back to Germany that war with which he had threatened France: that hence appeared the truth of that maxim, that victory itſelf could not ſave us, and that all our ſucceſſes ſerved only to accumulate new diſtreſſes, new difficulties, new charges; whilſt France, who had only contracted her expences by the loſs of her navy, encouraged us to enter deeper and deeper into the inextricable toils of a German war, in which we waſted our ſtrength only to entangle ourſelves further: that ſhe held the ſtrings, and could never be tired out at this ſort of game; from whence aroſe an expence unknown, even in thought, to our forefathers, and which the ſingle revenue of England was by no means able to bear: that our allies, if they deſerved the name, ſupplied not the leaſt part of this money; and the Hanoverians and Heſſians contributed to our aſſiſtance only by enabling us to protract ſtill longer our efforts in a ſyſtem, in which nothing could ſo effectually ſerve us as the being defeated as early as poſſible: that, with regard to the king of Pruſſia, what we paid to that monarch might rather be conſidered as a tribute than a ſubſidy, ſince we received nothing in return; and that, far from being able to afford any relief to our armies, he was ſcarcely in a condition to ſupport himſelf: that this alliance was ſtill worſe than the former, as it was an heavy charge, compenſated not only with no real, but even with no ſhewy advantage: that indeed he was an ally the laſt in the world we ought to have choſen, on account of his long connection with our worſt enemies, the mean and the hoſtile ſentiments he has always entertained towards us, the injuries he has done us, and the general lightneſs of his faith with reſpect to his former allies: that we regard him, it is true, as the protector of the proteſtant religion; but how lightly he thinks of all religion, his writings teſtify; and what miſchiefs he has done the proteſtant cauſe in particular, this war will be a laſting memorial: that when he entered Saxony, a proteſtant country, he found that religion no ways moleſted in thoſe places, where it had been eſtabliſhed or tolerated by the treaty of Weſtphalia; and even in the popiſh dominions, the perſecution began to loſe ſomething of its edge, when he, under the name of its protector, brought upon it as great a calamity as its moſt inveterate enemies could have wiſhed; by dividing the proteſtant ſtates of the empire, and ſetting proteſtants to cut the throats of proteſtants, whilſt all the papiſts were, at the ſame time, forced into a ſtrict confederacy: that, had we kept ourſelves clear of this ruinous ſyſtem, and, inſtead of engaging France on her ſtrong ſide, had attacked and vanquiſhed her colonies, one after another, we might, without exhauſting our own ſtrength, have gradually taken away the principal reſources of her trade; and whilſt we continued this method, have had as little reaſon to grow tired of a war, the whole funds of which would be ſpent at home, as France had to grow weary of the preſent manner of waging it: that if the powers on the continent were allowed, without our interpoſition, to do their own buſineſs, they would probably better underſtand and better defend their own rights: that, at worſt, let France enter, let her conquer, let her poſſeſs Hanover; there was no miſchief ſhe could do that country greater than it ſuffered by the preſent war; and we, not exhauſting ourſelves by a fruitleſs defence, ſhould, in the end, by the entire poſſeſſion of the French colonies, be able, beſides the ſecurity of our juſt claims, to reſtore the Hanoverian dominions to their lawful ſovereign, and even to procure ſome indemnification for the loſſes they might have ſuſtained in our quarrel.

The friends of the German war, on the other hand, aſſerted, that the beſt reaſons againſt our continental connections were more ſpecious than ſolid; and that the chief writings on that ſide of the queſtion, were rather declamations than arguments: that the complaint of the expence was, in ſome meaſure, juſt; but if the advantage was in any degree equivalent, the expence was incurred to good purpoſe: that France, by engaging ſo heartily as ſhe had done in the German war, had diverted ſo much of her attention and her revenue from the navy, that it enabled us to give ſuch a blow to her maritime ſtrength, as poſſibly ſhe might never be able to recover: that her engagement in the German war had likewiſe drawn her from the defence of her colonies, by which means we had conquered ſome of the moſt conſiderable ſhe poſſeſſed: that it had withdrawn her from the protection of her trade, by which it was entirely deſtroyed, whilſt that of England had never, in the profoundeſt peace, been in ſo flouriſhing a condition; ſo that, by embarking in this German war, France had ſuffered herſelf to be undone, ſo far as regarded her particular and immediate quarrel with England: but had ſhe, they aſked, obtained in Germany ſuch ſucceſſes as would counterbalance this loſs? Far, very far from it: at that very moment ſhe was infinitely leſs advanced than ſhe was the year ſhe entered Germany, after having ſpent ſuch immenſe ſums of money, and loſt, by the ſword, by diſeaſe, and by deſertion, an hundred thouſand of her people: that, on the other hand, the account ſtood not thus with regard to England; deeply embarked as ſhe had been in this German war, in her particular quarrel with France, ſhe had been carried along with an almoſt uninterrupted tide of ſucceſs; ſhe had taken many of the French colonies; ſhe had deſtroyed their navy and their trade; and having inſulted the enemy's coaſt, had ruined a harbour which might one day prove very alarming to England: that affairs in Germany were likewiſe in a very promiſing and agreeable ſituation; the French had been there frequently defeated; Hanover had been ſecured and protected; the king of Pruſſia had been preſerved, ſo far at leaſt, from the rage of his enemies; and, in general, the liberties of Germany had been hitherto ſecured: that thus, if we had incurred a great expence, we had done by it infinitely more than France had done at an expence infinitely greater than ours: that the advocates who declaimed againſt German connections, ſeemed to have forgot that the charge of the French army muſt exceed that of the Engliſh, in the ſame proportion as the number of their troops exceeded the difference between the French and the Engliſh pay: that thoſe on the Engliſh eſtabliſhment in Germany had, at no time, exceeded twenty-four thouſand, and the reſt of the confederates ſerved very nearly on the ſame terms with the French; not to mention the ſubſidies, ſo greatly ſuperior to ours, which that power paid to ſtates from whom ſhe had not a ſingle regiment to augment her armies. Thus, although by our victories France was relieved from the charge of her navy, and that of defending ſome of her moſt conſiderable colonies, the German war alone had brought her forces to a diſtreſs of which the whole world had been witneſs: nor indeed could any leſs have happened; the expence, however, contracted, was ſtill enormous; and trade, the reſource of every war, was almoſt deſtroyed: that in England the expence was alſo undoubtedly great; but then, the old trade ſtill remained to ſupply it, and new channels were opened: that, had we lain by and tamely beheld part of Germany poſſeſſed, and the reſt compelled to receive laws from France, the war then would ſoon have been brought to an end; and that that people, ſtrengthened by victory, by conqueſt, and alliance, would have been able to employ againſt us the whole force and whole revenue of their mighty monarchy: that it ought likewiſe to be conſidered, that common faith obliged us to adhere to our engagements both with Pruſſia and Hanover; and that the pleaded incapacity to aſſiſt them, ariſing from the greatneſs of the expence, could not excuſe us, becauſe the incapacity was not real; and if the expence was inconvenient, we ought to have attended to that circumſtance, when we contracted our engagement: that it cannot be true that we received no advantage from our alliance with the king of Pruſſia; becauſe, if it be once admitted that we entered with any reaſon into the German war, which they ſuppoſed undeniable, then the king of Pruſſia had been of very conſiderable ſervice to us, inaſmuch as it was his victory at Roſbach, and the reinforcement from his troops, which had enabled us to do all that we had ſince atchieved: beſides, if the ſupport of the proteſtant religion were any part of our care, that religion muſt ſuffer ſeverely by the ruin of the king of Pruſſia; for though the writings attributed to his Pruſſian majeſty were ſuch, as, if really his, reflected, on account of their impiety, great diſgrace on his character as a man, yet as a king, in his public and political capacity, he is the natural protector of the proteſtant religion, and it will always be his intereſt to defend it.

Such were the ſentiments of the two parties with regard to the nature of our German connections, when the parliament aſſembling in the month of November, the king repaired to the houſe of lords, and the commons aſſembling as uſual, he declared from the throne the following ſpeech to both houſes:

" My lords and gentlemen,

" The juſt concern which I have felt in my own breaſt, on the ſudden death of the late king my royal grandfather, makes me not doubt but you muſt all have been deeply affected with ſo ſevere a loſs. The preſent critical and difficult conjuncture has made this loſs the more ſenſible, as he was the great ſupport of that ſyſtem, by which alone the liberties of Europe, and the weight and influence of theſe kingdoms can be preſerved, and give life to meaſures conducive to thoſe important ends.

" I need not tell you the addition of weight which immediately falls upon me, in being called to the government of this free and powerful country at ſuch a time, and under ſuch circumſtances. My conſolation is in the uprightneſs of my own intentions, your faithful and united aſſiſtance, and the bleſſing of heaven upon our joint endeavours, which I devoutly implore.

" Born and educated in this country, I glory in the name of Briton; and the peculiar happineſs of my life will ever conſiſt in promoting the welfare of a people, whoſe loyalty and warm affection to me I conſider as the greateſt and moſt permanent ſecurity of my throne; and I doubt not but their ſteadineſs in thoſe principles will equal the firmneſs of my invariable reſolutions to adhere to and ſtrengthen this excellent conſtitution in church and ſtate, and to maintain the toleration inviolable. The civil and the religious rights of my loving ſubjects are equally dear to me with the moſt valuable prerogatives of my crown; and, as the ſureſt foundation of the whole, and the beſt means to draw down the divine favour on my reign, it is my fixed purpoſe to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue.

" I reflect with pleaſure on the ſucceſſes with which the Britiſh arms have been proſpered this laſt ſummer. The total reduction of the vaſt province of Canada, with the city of Montreal, is of the moſt intereſting conſequence, and muſt be as heavy a blow to my enemies, as it is a conqueſt glorious to us; the more glorious, becauſe effected without effuſion of blood, and with that humanity which makes an amiable part of the character of this nation.

" Our advantages gained in the Eaſt Indies have been ſignal, and muſt greatly diminiſh the ſtrength and trade of France in thoſe parts, as well as procure the moſt ſolid benefits to the commerce and wealth of my ſubjects.

" In Germany, where the whole French force has been employed, the combined army, under the wiſe and able conduct of my general prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, has not only ſtopt their progreſs, but has gained advantages over them, notwithſtanding their boaſted ſuperiority, and their not having hitherto come to a general engagement.

" My good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia, although ſurrounded with numerous armies of enemies, has, with a magnanimity and perſeverance almoſt beyond example, not only withſtood their various attacks, but has obtained very conſiderable victories over them.

" Of theſe events I ſhall ſay no more at this time, becauſe the nature of the war in thoſe parts has kept the campaign there ſtill depending.

" As my navy is the principal article of our naval ſtrength, it gives me much ſatisfaction to receive it in ſuch good condition; whilſt the fleet of France is weakened to ſuch a degree, that the ſmall remains of it have continued blocked up by my ſhips in their own ports: at the ſame time, the French trade is reduced to the loweſt ebb; and with joy of heart I ſee the commerce of my kingdoms, that great ſource of our riches, and fixed object of my never-failing care and protection, flouriſhing to an extent unknown in any former war.

" The valour and intrepidity of my officers and forces, both at ſea and land, have been diſtinguiſhed ſo much to the glory of this nation, that I ſhould be wanting in juſtice to them if I did not acknowlege it. This is a merit which I ſhall conſtantly encourage and reward; and I take this occaſion to declare, that the zealous and uſeful ſervice of the militia, in the preſent arduous conjuncture, is very acceptable to me.

" In this ſtate I have found things at my acceſſion to the throne of my anceſtors: happy in viewing the proſperous part of it; happier ſtill ſhould I have been, had I found my kingdoms, whoſe true intereſt I have entirely at heart, in full peace: but ſince the ambition, injurious encroachments, and dangerous deſigns of my enemies, rendered the war both juſt and neceſſary, and the generous overture made laſt winter towards a congreſs for a pacification, has not yet produced any ſuitable return, I am determined, with your cheerful and powerful powerful aſſiſtance, to proſecute this war with vigour, in order to that deſirable object, a ſafe and honourable peace. For this purpoſe, it is abſolutely incumbent upon us to be early prepared; and I rely upon your zeal and hearty concurrence to ſupport the king of Pruſſia, and the reſt of my allies, and to make ample proviſion for carrying on the war, as the only means to bring our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation."

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"The greateſt uneaſineſs which I feel at this time, is in conſidering the uncommon burthens neceſſarily brought upon my faithful ſubjects. I deſire only ſuch ſupplies as ſhall be requiſite to proſecute the war with advantage; be adequate to the neceſſary ſervices; and that they may be provided for in the moſt ſure and effectual manner. You may depend upon the faithful and punctual application of what ſhall be granted. I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the enſuing year to be laid before you; and alſo an account of the extraordinary expences which, from the nature of the different and remote operations, have been unavoidably incurred.

"It is with peculiar reluctance that I am obliged to mention any thing which perſonally regards myſelf. But as the grant of the greateſt part of the civil liſt revenues is now determined, I truſt in your duty and affection to me, to make the proper proviſion for ſupporting my civil government with honour and dignity. On my part, you may be aſſured of a regular and becoming œconomy.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The eyes of all Europe upon you. From your reſolutions the proteſtant intereſt hopes for protection, as well as all our friends for the preſervation of their independency; and our enemies fear the final diſappointment of their ambitious and deſtructive views. Let theſe hopes and fears be confirmed and augmented by the vigour and diſpatch of our proceedings.

"In this expectation I am the more encouraged by a pleaſing circumſtance, which I look upon as one of the moſt auſpicious omens of my reign: that happy extinction of diviſions, and that union and good harmony which continue to prevail amongſt my ſubjects, afford me the moſt agreeable proſpect. The natural diſpoſition and wiſh of my heart are to cement and promote them; and I promiſe myſelf that nothing will ariſe on your part to interrupt or diſturb a ſituation ſo eſſential to the true and laſting felicity of this great people."

In anſwer to this ſenſible ſpeech, the two houſes preſented addreſſes, filled with expreſſions of the ſtrongeſt veneration and attachment. As the ſubſtance of both was ſimilar, or rather the ſame, it will be ſufficient to inſert that of the commons, which was conceived in the following ſtrain:

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Great Britain, in parliament aſſembled, approach your royal preſence, to expreſs the deepeſt ſenſe of the great and ſevere loſs which your majeſty and theſe kingdoms have ſuſtained by the death of your majeſty's royal grandfather, our late moſt excellent ſovereign; the memory of whoſe juſt and proſperous reign will be held in reverence by lateſt poſterity.

"We beg leave to congratulate your majeſty on your happy acceſſion to the throne, the only conſideration that can alleviate our grief for ſuch a loſs. The knowlege of your majeſty's royal virtues, wiſdom, and firmneſs, opens to your faithful ſubjects the faireſt proſpect for their future happineſs at home, and for the continuance of that weight and influence of your majeſty's crown abroad, ſo eſſentially neceſſary, in this arduous and critical conjuncture, for the preſervation of that ſyſtem upon which the liberties of Europe depend.

"We return your majeſty our humble thanks for your moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne; and acknowlege, with the livelieſt ſentiments of duty, gratitude, and exultation of mind, thoſe moſt affecting and animating words of our ſovereign, That, born and educated in this country, he glories in the name of Briton. And we offer to your majeſty the full tribute of our hearts, for the warm and tender expreſſions of your truly royal and tender affection towards your people. We venerate and confide in thoſe ſacred aſſurances of your majeſty's firm and invariable reſolution to adhere to and ſtrengthen this excellent conſtitution in church and ſtate; to maintain the toleration inviolate; and to protect your faithful ſubjects in that greateſt of human bleſſings, the ſecure enjoyment of their religious and civil liberties.

"Permit us to congratulate your majeſty on the various ſucceſſes which, under the protection of God, have attended the Britiſh arms during the laſt ſummer, particularly in the reduction of Montreal, and the entire province of Canada; a conqueſt equally important and glorious, atchieved with intrepidity and cloſed with humanity, the genuine attributes of that Britiſh ſpirit, which, under the benign auſpices of your majeſty, will, we truſt, continue, by the Divine aſſiſtance, to give additional luſtre to the arms of Great Britain.

"This valuable and extenſive acquiſition, joined to the ſignal advantages gained in the Eaſt Indies; the flouriſhing ſtate of our commerce; the reſpectable condition of your majeſty's navy, by which the remains of the enemy's fleet continue blocked up in their harbours, whilſt their trade is almoſt annihilated; are conſiderations which fill our hearts with the moſt pleaſing hopes, that your majeſty will be thereby enabled to proſecute this juſt and neceſſary war, to that great and deſirable object of eſtabliſhing, in conjunction with your allies, a ſafe, honourable, and laſting peace.

"We ſee, with the greateſt pleaſure, that the progreſs of the French arms in Germany, notwithſtanding their ſuperiority of numbers, has been ſtopt, and, to the honour of your majeſty's arms, their attempts hitherto baffled, by the wiſe and able conduct of his ſerene highneſs prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic.

"When we conſider the ſtupendous efforts made in every campaign by your majeſty's great ally the king of Pruſſia, the defeat of the Auſtrians in Sileſia, and that recent and glorious victory obtained over the army commanded by marſhal Daun, we cannot ſufficiently admire the invincible conſtancy of mind, and inexhauſtible reſources of genius, diſplayed by that magnanimous monarch, to whom the moſt dangerous, and difficult ſituations have only adminiſtered freſh occaſions for glory.

" Our moſt dutiful acknowledgements are due to your majeſty for the mention you have ſo graciouſly made of the diſtinguiſhed valour and intrepidity of your officers and forces at ſea and land, and for the declaration of your majeſty's conſtant reſolution to encourage and reward ſuch merit; and we return our moſt humble thanks to your majeſty for your favourable acceptance of the zealous and uſeful ſervice of the militia, in the preſent arduous conjuncture.

" We aſſure your majeſty, that your faithful commons, thoroughly ſenſible of this important criſis, and deſirous, with the divine aſſiſtance, to render your majeſty's reign ſucceſsful and glorious in war, happy and honourable in peace (the natural return of a grateful people to a gracious and affectionate ſovereign) will concur in ſuch meaſures as ſhall be requiſite for the vigorous and effectual proſecution of the war; and that we will chearfully and ſpeedily grant ſuch ſupplies as ſhall be found neceſſary for that purpoſe, and for the ſupport of the king of Pruſſia, and the reſt of your majeſty's allies: firmly relying on your majeſty's wiſdom, goodneſs, and juſtice, that they will be applied in ſuch a manner as will moſt effectually anſwer the ends for which they are granted, and with the utmoſt œconomy that the nature of ſuch great and extenſive operations will allow; and that we will make ſuch an adequate proviſion for your majeſty's civil government as may be ſufficient to maintain the honour and dignity of your crown with all proper and becoming luſtre.

" Your majeſty's faithful commons approach your royal perſon with hearts penetrated by the warmeſt and livelieſt ſenſe of your unbounded tenderneſs and concern for the welfare of your people; and rejoicing at the high ſatisfaction your majeſty takes in the union which ſo univerſally prevails throughout your kingdoms: a deep ſenſe of that national ſtrength and proſperity viſibly derived from this ſalutary ſource, and above all, your majeſty's approbation of that happy union, and the natural diſpoſition and wiſh of your royal heart, to cement and promote it; are the ſtrongeſt incentives to concord, and the ſureſt pledge of its duration. The fixed reſolution, which your majeſty has declared, to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue, will, we doubt not, prove the beſt means of drawing down the favour of God upon a dutiful and united nation: and we ſhall never ceaſe devoutly to offer up our ardent vows to the Divine Providence, that, as a recompence for theſe royal virtues, your majeſty may reign in the hearts of a free and happy people; and that they, excited by your majeſty's benevolent care to diſcharge your royal function, and animated by gratitude for the enjoyment of ſo many bleſſings, may make the due return, by a conſtant obedience to your laws, and by the moſt ſteady attachment and loyalty to your perſon and government."

The commons, not ſatisfied with theſe aſſurances of their loyalty and affection, agreed to a ſecond addreſs of thanks for the gracious manner in which the firſt had been received by his majeſty. Even before they had eſtabliſhed the orders and reſolutions renewed at the beginning of every ſeſſion, they proceeded to take this ſpeech into conſideration. A motion being made that a ſupply ſhould be granted to his majeſty, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee, agreed to the motion, and immediately appointed the committee of ſupply, which was continued to the ſixth day of March. It was in purſuance of theſe reſolutions, that the houſe of commons granted for the ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and of the honour and dignity of the crown, during his life, ſuch a revenue as, together with the annuities payable by virtue of any acts of parliament made in the reign of the late king, out of the hereditary civil liſt revenues, ſhould amount to the clear yearly ſum of eight hundred thouſand pounds, to commence from the demiſe of his late majeſty; to be charged upon, and made payable out of the aggregate fund. At the ſame time they reſolved, that the ſeveral revenues payable to his late majeſty, during his life, which continued to the time of his demiſe (other than ſuch payments as were charged upon, and iſſuing out of the aggregate fund) ſhould be granted and continued from the time of the ſaid demiſe, to his preſent majeſty during his life; and the produce of the ſaid revenues, together with the produce of the hereditary revenues, which were ſettled, or appointed, towards the ſupport of the late king's houſhold, ſhould be, during the ſaid term, added to, and conſolidated with the aggregate fund.

The commons next proceeded to grant the ſupplies for the ſervice of the enſuing year; the ſum total of which amounted to nineteen millions ſix hundred ſixteen thouſand one hundred and nineteen pounds nineteen ſhillings ninepence three farthings: a ſum, which, however, large, and even ſeemingly enormous, yet whoever conſiders the extenſive nature of our military operations in almoſt every quarter, will allow, perhaps, to be no more than was abſolutely neceſſary.

This great ſupply was raiſed by a continuation of the land and malt taxes, which conſtituted the ſtanding revenue of the nation, and by borrowing the ſum of twelve millions, the intereſt to be paid by an additional duty on beer and ale: by a continuation of the duties of ten ſhillings per ton upon all wines, vinegar, cyder, and beer, imported into Great-Britain, formerly granted by act of parliament for defraying the charges of the mint: by loans or exchequer-bills for one million five hundred thouſand pounds, to be charged on the firſt aids to be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament: by a ſum remaining in the Receipt of the Exchequer, being part of ninety thouſand pounds granted to the late king in the year 1759, upon account, towards defraying the charge of the militia: by iſſuing one million ſeven hundred ſixty-two thouſand four hundred pounds from the ſinking fund. The whole of the proviſions made in this ſeſſion fell very little ſhort of twenty millions ſterling; the ſuperplus being intended to ſupply the deficiencies that might happen in any of the funds that had been eſtabliſhed.

In the beginning of the ſeſſion, before the committee had taken the civil liſt into conſideration, the king ſent a meſſage by the chancellor of the Exchequer, informing the houſe of commons, that, being ever ready and deſirous to give the moſt ſubſtantial proofs of his tender regard to the welfare of his people, he was willing, that, whenever the houſe ſhould make proviſion for the ſupport of his houſhold, and of the honour and dignity of the crown, ſuch diſpoſition might be made of his majeſty's intereſt in the hereditary revenues of the crown, as might beſt conduce to the utility and ſatisfaction of the public. In conſequence of this intimation, the houſe deliberated on the matter, and the king willingly accepted a certain proviſion of eight hundred thouſand pounds per annum, ſettled by act of parliament, in lieu of the former funds appropriated for the civil liſt revenue; and this conſent was undoubtedly a royal inſtance of moderation, conſidering that this annuity was charged with fifty thouſand pounds a year to his mother the princeſs dowager of Wales, fifteen thouſand pounds per annum to the duke of Cumberland, and twelve thouſand to the princeſs Amelia. After theſe deductions, his majeſty received no more than ſeven hundred and twenty-three thouſand pounds annually, for the ſupport of his public ſtate, the ſubſiſtence of all his brothers and ſiſters, and the maintenance of his royal and encreaſing family.

The bills founded on the reſolutions of the committee of ways and means were regularly introduced, and paſſed into laws, according to the uſual form, without any oppoſition or debate: for the whole houſe ſeemed to be actuated by the ſame ſpirit of loyalty and affection. The navy bill and the mutiny bill underwent the annual diſcuſſion, as uſual; and the proviſions in this laſt, relating to the trial and puniſhment for mutiny and deſertion of officers and ſoldiers in the ſervice of the Eaſt-India company, were by a new bill extended to the company's ſettlement of Fort Marlborough, and to ſuch other principal ſettlements, wherein the company might be hereafter impowered to hold courts of judicature.

As the acceſſion of a new king to the throne of Great-Britain has been generally diſtinguiſhed by acts of grace in favour of debtors and delinquents, petitions were now preſented to the houſe of commons by perſons confined for debt in the different gaols of London, the borough of Southwark, and other parts of the kingdom, deſcribing their ſituation, and imploring relief from the legiſlature.

To the cries of theſe captives, the legiſlature lent a favourable ear; and a bill in their behalf was brought into the houſe of commons, which afterwards paſſed into an act for the relief of priſoners. It contained a very remarkable clauſe, importing, that as many perſons too often chooſe rather to continue in priſon, and ſpend their ſubſtance there, than diſcover and deliver up to their creditors their eſtates or effects, towards ſatisfying their juſt debts; the creditors may compel any priſoner committed, or who ſhall hereafter be committed, and charged in execution, to appear at the quarter-ſeſſions, with the copy of his detainer, and deliver, upon oath, a juſt ſchedule of his eſtate: that a priſoner, ſubſcribing the ſchedule, and making a diſcovery of his eſtate, ſhall be diſcharged at the general or quarter ſeſſions, under this act: and that on his refuſal ſo to do, or concealing to the amount of twenty pounds, he ſhall ſuffer as a felon.

This compulſive clauſe was attended with a conſequence, which, in all probability, the legiſlature did not foreſee. Great numbers of tradeſmen, and people in the lower claſſes of life, and even many who had moved in a higher ſphere, were ſaid to have laid hold on this opportunity of diſencumbering themſelves from their debts, which might have been honeſtly paid by a proper exertion of induſtry and temperance. Every perſon deſirous of reaping the benefit of the act, prevailed upon ſome relation or friend to perform the part of compelling creditor. The public complained that the gaols about London were crouded with a ſucceſſion of theſe voluntary captives; and that a great number of honeſt men were ruined by this indulgence ſhewn to their debtors by the clemency of parliament.

Certain it is, the common council of the city of London, in their inſtructions to the repreſentatives in the new parliament, recommended to them to exert their utmoſt endeavours to procure the repeal of this compulſive clauſe, as a manifeſt grievance to the public.

In the month of January the king ſent a meſſage to the commons, importing, that his majeſty being ſenſible of the zeal and vigour with which his faithful ſubjects in North America had exerted themſelves, in defence of his juſt rights and poſſeſſions, recommended it to the houſe to take their ſervices into conſideration, and enable his majeſty to give them a proper recompence for the expence incurred by the reſpective provinces in levying, cloathing, and maintaining the troops they had raiſed, according as the active vigour, and ſtrenuous efforts of the reſpective provinces ſhould appear to merit. This intimation was referred to the committee of ſupply, and that reſolution taken in favour of the American provinces which we have mentioned before among the grants of the year. The royal meſſage was likewiſe procured in favour of the Eaſt-India company, for enabling them to defray the expence of a military force in India; and they were accordingly gratified with the ſum already ſpecified under that article.

In the beginning of March the king made a propoſal for ſecuring the independency of the judges, which could not fail to inſpire the ſubject with the moſt favourable opinion of his royal candour and moderation. In a ſpeech from the throne he informed both houſes of parliament, that, upon granting new commiſſions to the judges, the preſent ſtate of their offices fell naturally under conſideration: that, notwithſtanding the act paſſed in the reign of king William III. for ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown, by which act the commiſſions of the judges were continued in force during their good behaviour, yet their offices had determined at the demiſe of the crown, or in ſix months after that event, as often as it had happened: that as he looked upon the independency and uprightneſs of the judges as eſſential to the impartial adminiſtration of juſtice, one of the beſt ſecurities to the rights and liberties of his ſubjects, as well as conducive to the honour of the crown, he recommended this intereſting object to the conſideration of parliament, in order that ſuch further proviſion might be made for ſecuring the judges in the enjoyment of their offices during their good behaviour, notwithſtanding any ſuch demiſe, as ſhould be be moſt expedient: that he hoped the commons would enable him to grant, and eſtabliſh upon the judges, ſuch ſalaries as he ſhould think proper, ſo as to be abſolutely ſecured to them during the continuance of their commiſſions: and that he could not let ſlip the preſent opportunity of thanking both houſes for the great unanimity and application with which they had hitherto carried on the public buſineſs; exhorting them to proceed with the ſame good diſpoſition, and with ſuch diſpatch, that this ſeſſion might be brought to a happy concluſion.

This ſpeech was received with that univerſal applauſe, which it ſo well deſerved. The commons unanimouſly reſolved to diſplay their gratitude in an addreſs to the throne. They acknowledged the moſt lively ſenſe of his majeſty's attention to an object ſo intereſting to his people. They aſſured him, that his faithful commons ſaw, with joy and veneration, the warm regard and concern which animated his royal breaſt for the ſecurity of the religion, laws, liberties, and properties of his ſubjects: that the houſe would immediately proceed upon the important work recommended by his majeſty with ſuch tender care of his people; and would enable him to eſtabliſh the ſalaries of the judges in ſuch a permanent manner, that they might be enjoyed during the continuance of their commiſſions. They forthwith began to deliberate upon this ſubject; and their reſolutions terminated in a law, enacting, among other particulars, That ſuch part of the ſalaries of the judges as was before payable out of the yearly ſums granted for the ſupport of the king's houſhold, and of the honour and dignity of the crown, ſhould, after the demiſe of his preſent majeſty, be charged upon, and payable out of all or any ſuch duties or revenues, granted for the uſe of the civil government, as ſhould ſubſiſt after the demiſe of his majeſty, or of any of his heirs and ſucceſſors. Thus the individuals, intruſted with the adminiſtration of the laws, were effectually emancipated from the power of the prerogative, and of all undue influence.

It was likewiſe in the beginning of March that the chancellor of the Exchequer communicated a meſſage from the king to the commons, deſiring the houſe would enable him to defray any extraordinary expences of the war, incurred, or to be incurred, for the ſervice of the year 1761. This meſſage was immediately referred to the conſideration of the committee of ſupply; and his majeſty was indulged with one million, upon account, as we have already mentioned.

Mr. Onſlow, who had ſo long filled the ſpeaker's chair with equal candour and capacity, having ſignified his intention to retire from buſineſs, in conſequence of age, infirmities, and other motives of a private nature, the commons determined to beſtow upon him ſome ſignal marks of their eſteem and regard. They accordingly reſolved, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to Mr. Speaker, for his conſtant and unwearied attendance in the chair, during the courſe of above thirty-three years, in five ſucceſſive parliaments; for the unſhaken integrity and ſteady impartiality of his conduct there; and for the indefatigable pains he had, with uncommon abilities, conſtantly taken to promote the honour and dignity of parliament, and to preſerve inviolable, the rights and privileges of the commons of Great-Britain.

The houſe alſo reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the king, humbly to beſeech his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to confer ſome ſignal mark of his royal favour upon the right honourable Arthur Onſlow, eſq; for his great and eminent ſervices performed to his country, for the ſpace of thirty-three years and upwards. This application was very agreeable to the king's own generous diſpoſition. He expreſſed a proper ſenſe of the ſpeaker's great ſervices, and unblemiſhed character; and that gentleman was gratified with an annual penſion of three thouſand pounds, payable out of his majeſty's treaſure at the Exchequer, for his own life and that of his ſon. All the public buſineſs being diſpatched, and all the bills having received the royal ſanction, the king repaired to the houſe of lords on the nineteenth day of March, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne.

Before I proceed to relate the operations of war during this year in the different climates of Europe, Aſia, Africa, and America, I think it neceſſary to obſerve, that the acceſſion of his preſent majeſty produced no alteration in the ſyſtem of public affairs, and was attended with no revolution of any conſequence, either in the church, the ſtate, or the army. The metropolitan ſee of Canterbury was ſtill poſſeſſed by Secker, alike diſtinguiſhed for his piety and learning. The office of lord high chancellor was conferred upon lord Henly, baron Grange, who had given manifold proofs of his independent ſpirit, knowledge, and integrity. Lord Mansfield maintained his ſeat on the King's Bench, and judge Willes in the Common Pleas. The miniſtry and cabinet council underwent no material alteration, except in the acceſſion of the earl of Bute, who ſucceeded the earl of Holderneſs as ſecretary of ſtate for the northern department, and was ſuppoſed to ſtand with Mr. Pitt, the other ſecretary, as joint pilot at the helm of adminiſtration. The duke of Newcaſtle ſtill directed the treaſury; earl Granville preſided at the council; and lord Anſon at the board of Admiralty. Earl Temple kept the privy ſeal; and Mr. Legge acted as chancellor of the Exchequer, though in a little time he was diſmiſſed from that employment. Mr. Charles Townſhend being appointed ſecretary at war, ſoon proved by his conduct the fallacy of that maxim which holds genius inconſiſtent with induſtry; and performed every part of this office with ſuch accuracy and expedition, as had never before appeared in that ſcene of tranſaction. The lucrative poſt of paymaſter remained with Mr. Henry Fox, who, though not very acceptable to either party, had, by mere ſuperiority of parts, been able to maintain his footing with both.

The management of the king's houſhold devolved upon noblemen of unblemiſhed characters. The chamberlain's wand was delivered to the duke of Devonſhire, univerſally beloved for his generoſity, and ſweetneſs of diſpoſition. The duke of Rutland, ſo diſtinguiſhed for his benevolence, was created maſter of the horſe; and the office of lord ſteward was beſtowed upon earl Talbot, who, with equal ſpirit and perſeverance, reformed many enormous abuſes in the œconomy of the king's houſhold. The earl of Halifax was nominated lord lieutenant of Ireland. Divers young noblemen were appointed lords of the king's bed-chamber †; and a very few alterations made in places of truſt and profit; but, in general, all the members of the great offices, and all the commiſſioners of the revenue throughout the three kingdoms, were continued in their reſpective employments.

The chief command of the army in Great Britain was enjoyed by the lord viſcount Ligonier. The German army in Weſtphalia, paid by England, remained under the auſpices of prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic; the marquis of Granby commanded the Britiſh forces on that ſervice; and the direction of the troops in America was ſtill intruſted to Sir Jeffery Amherſt. Neither was any material change produced in the diſpoſition of the different ſquadrons which compoſed the navy of Great Britain. Admiral Holborn's flag continued flying at Spithead. Sir Edward Hawke and Sir Charles Hardy were ſtationed in the bay of Quiberon. Sir Charles Saunders kept the ſea in the Mediterranean. The rear-admirals Stevens and Corniſh commanded one ſquadron in the Eaſt-Indies; rear-admiral Holmes another at Jamaica; Sir James Douglas a third at the Leeward Iſlands; lord Colvil a fourth at Halifax in Nova Scotia. Theſe were ſtationary; but other ſquadrons were equipped occaſionally, under different commanders; beſides the ſingle ſhips that cruized in and about the Channel, and thoſe that were ſtationed to protect the trade of Great-Britain in different parts of the world.

But let us now turn our eyes to the continent of Europe. The events of the laſt campaign had produced no material alteration in the political ſyſtem of its different princes and ſtates. Thoſe that profeſſed a neutrality, ſtill kept aloof, and enjoyed the fruits of their forbearance. The Dutch continued to trade, and grumble at the interruption which their navigation ſuſtained from the Engliſh cruiſers: nay, the ſtates of Holland and Weſt Frieſland reſolved, in conſequence of the proceedings of the Engliſh, that twelve ſhips of the line ſhould be equipped with all expedition, and employed in cruizing in the Mediterranean for the protection of their commerce. The Danes extended their trade in ſilence. The Spaniards at laſt began to feel the benefit of an active traffic. The Portugueſe monarch was wholly engaged in the trial and expulſion of jeſuits and conſpirators. The court of Vienna ſeemed more and more determined upon proſecuting the war with vigour. The empreſs of Ruſſia promiſed to act in perfect concert with her allies: the Swedes appeared ſtill irreſolute. As for the French monarch, whatever ambition or intereſt he might have to atchieve conqueſts, or to retrieve what he had loſt in the courſe of the war, his finances were ſo encumbered, that he could no longer furniſh the ſubſidies which he had promiſed to the allies of his crown; and therefore profeſſed an earneſt deſire to put an end to the troubles which had ſo long deſolated the beſt part of Europe.

In the month of February his ambaſſador at the court of Stockholm delivered a declaration to the Swediſh monarch, importing, that the moſt Chriſtian king, moved by the calamities of war, ſo widely diffuſed, and ſo ſeverely felt in different parts of the world, thought it his indiſpenſible duty to declare, that his humanity in general, and his regard to his own ſubjects in particular, prompted him to expreſs his deſire that his allies would concur with him in reſtoring the peace of Europe: that in adjuſting the differences between France and England, he would abundantly diſplay his moderation, whenever Great Britain ſhould be inclined to acquieſce in reaſonable terms: that common humanity required his allies to concert with him a plan of pacification, and he hoped every member of the alliance would labour to ſtrengthen, if poſſible, the bands of amity with which they were connected: that, in the mean time, an accumulation of diſtreſs among his unhappy ſubjects, an additional depopulation of countries, a diſorder in the finances of ſeveral powers, and the greateſt doubt whether an advantageous peace could be made in Germany, induced him to declare, that as the war had conſiderably diminiſhed his reſources, he was conſtrained to leſſen his ſubſidies, and even to give notice, that, ſhould the war continue, he could no longer promiſe an exact compliance with the letter of his engagements.

France was not only exhauſted by external wars, but likewiſe embroiled with internal diſſenſions. The diſputes between the clergy, and the civil adminiſtration of juſtice, far from being quieted by the royal authority, ſeemed to acquire freſh rancour from ſome late complaints exhibited againſt the Jeſuits; a ſociety which at this juncture incurred univerſal odium, from the intrigues and conſpiracy which ſome of their members had conducted in the kingdom of Portugal. They were extremely unpopular in France, not only on account of the doctrines which they taught and promulgated in their ſeminaries and writings, but alſo for their officious interfering in temporal concerns; and particularly for ſome frauds in commerce, of which they were loudly and univerſally accuſed. They had proſecuted a conſiderable traffic with the iſland of Martinique; and ſome of their veſſels being taken by the Engliſh cruiſers, ſeized this pretence for ſtopping payment, in order to defraud their creditors: but they were cited before the tribunals of the kingdom, and compelled to do juſtice to thoſe whom they had intended to injure. The iſſue of this proſecution was attended with new diſgrace to the whole order, and the people in general wiſhed for their expulſion from France. The parliament of Paris took cognizance of their books, ſome of which they condemned to the flames, as containing doctrines ſubverſive of all government and morality. They moreover iſſued ſome ſevere edicts againſt the ſociety; but the king interpoſing in their behalf, publiſhed an arret, ſuſpending all proceedings againſt them for a twelvemonth. This the parliament conſented to regiſter, on condition that it ſhould continue in force no longer than the firſt of April; at the ſame time they directed the firſt preſident to repreſent in the ſtrongeſt terms to his majeſty, the ill conſequences of protecting ſuch a pernicious order; the more dangerous from their great number, which in France alone was computed to amount to above twenty thouſand.

† The earl of Kildare was created a marquis of the kingdom of Ireland. Lord Delawar was promoted to the rank of earl of Cantalupe. The honourable John Spencer, firſt couſin to the duke of Marlborough, was ennobled by the title of baron Spencer of Althorp in the county of Northampton, and viſcount Spencer. George Doddington was made lord Melcomb, baron of Melcomb-Regis in the county of Dorſet. Sir Thomas Robinſon was created baron Grantham in Lincolnſhire; Sir Nathaniel Curzon, baron Scarſdale in the county of Derby, and Sir William Irby, lord Boſton, baron of Boſton in the county of Lincoln. Mary counteſs of Bute was veſted with the title of baroneſs Mountſtuart, of Wortley in the county of York; the title of baron to devolve to her lawful iſſue male by John earl of Bute.

Archibald duke of Argyle dying in April, the title and eſtate devolved on his couſin lieutenant general John Campbell. The marquis of Tweedale was conſtituted juſtice general of Scotland, in the room of the deceaſed duke; whoſe poſt of keeper of the ſeal for Scotland was given to Charles duke of Queenſberry.

The war ſtill continued to rage with unabated fury in Germany. In the beginning of January, while both armies remained in winter-quarters, the head-quarters of prince Ferdinand being at Uſlar, and thoſe of the French general in Heſſe Caſſel, divers hot ſkirmiſhes happened in different parts of Weſtphalia. General Luckner, with four thouſand men of the allied army, had in December been driven from Heligenſtadt by a more numerous body of French under the command of the count de Broglio. In the beginning of January the ſame count, reinforced by Mr. de Stainville, conſtrained general Mansberg to abandon the town of Duderſtat, where he was poſted; but a reinforcement arriving under Kilmanſegge and Luckner, the French were expelled in their turn, and purſued with conſiderable loſs as far as Witzenhauſen.

Prince Ferdinand having aſſembled his army in the beginning of February, began his march towards Caſſel on the eleventh day of the month, in four columns, by the way of Warbourg, Liebenau, Sielen, and Dringelbourg; the command of the vanguard being aſſigned to the marquis of Granby, who advanced to Kerchberg and Metze. In the mean time, the hereditary prince having received intelligence that the French garriſon of Fritzlar was not prepared for a defence, he marched thither with a few battalions, in hope of carrying the place by a ſudden aſſault with muſquetry only: but he met with ſuch a warm reception, that he was obliged to wait for the arrival of cannon and mortars, which were plied with great vivacity; and the garriſon being deſtitute of artillery, colonel de Narbonnes, their commander, capitulated on honourable terms, after having made a very gallant reſiſtance. During theſe tranſactions, lieutenant-general Briedenbach took poſſeſſion of a large magazine at Roſenthal, and made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Marpurg, in which he loſt his life; but this place was afterwards relinquiſhed by the French at the approach of the marquis of Granby, who took poſſeſſion of it without oppoſition. Gudersberg likewiſe ſurrendered to the ſame general.

General Sporcken, with the united corps of Kilmanſegge and Wangenheim, had advanced by the way of Dargelſtadt to Thomas-ſpruck, upon the Unſtrut. There being reinforced by a body of Pruſſians, he fell upon the Saxon troops, cantoned between Mulhauſen and Eyſenach, with ſuch vigour and ſucceſs, that a great number were killed, and five entire battalions made priſoners of war. On the other hand, the enemy attacked the poſt of Gentzungen, near Filtzberg, from whence they were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. The deſign of prince Ferdinand was to reduce Ziegenhayn and Caſſel, before the Duc de Broglio ſhould receive his reinforcements; and theſe two places were accordingly inveſted.

The allied army was cantoned in two lines, with the right extending to the Lahne, and the left ſtretched towards Fulda; while prince Ferdinand fixed his quarters at Schwienſberg. Lord Granby, having left a garriſon in Marpurg, marched into the neighbourhood of Lohr. Another body, under general Hardenberg, advanced to Kircham; while the detachment employed at the ſiege of Caſſel proceeded very ſlowly in their operations, and received ſome mortifying checks from vigorous ſallies that were made by the garriſon. At length the Duc de Broglio, being joined by all the detachments he expected from the Lower Rhine, advanced towards the army of the allies, which at this time was in no condition to cope with him in the field. On the twenty-firſt day of March the detachment under the hereditary prince was, in its retreat from Heimbach, encountered by a numerous body of the enemy, near the village of Stangerode, in the neighbourhood of Grunberg. Baron Cloſen, who commanded the French troops on this occaſion, attacked nine regiments of Hanoverians, Heſſians, and Brunſwickers, at the head of his dragoons, with ſuch impetuoſity, juſt as they were entering a defile, that they were totally defeated with the loſs of two thouſand men, either killed or taken, eighteen pair of colours, and twelve pieces of artillery. Major-general de Rhede fell in the action, and the reſt of the detachment retired in tolerable order.

After this diſaſter, the allies continued to retreat as the enemy advanced. They relinquiſhed the ſiege of Ziegenhayn, from which they did not retire without conſiderable loſs. All the places they had lately conquered were now deſerted. The ſiege of Caſſel was raiſed; the army took poſt behind the Dymel, and prince Ferdinand eſtabliſhed his head quarters at Neuhas near Paderborn. In conſequence of theſe motions, the French were again in poſſeſſion of the whole landgraviate of Heſſe-Caſſel, maſters of Gottingen and Munden in Hanover, and at liberty to penetrate into the heart of that electorate. The ſituation of the allies appeared the more dangerous, as the prince de Soubiſe was at the head of a ſecond French army, encamped on the Lower Rhine; and if he had heartily co-operated with the mareſchal de Broglio, it is generally thought they might have terminated the war before the cloſe of the ſummer.

Their progreſs, however, was retarded by the loſs of a large magazine of hay, collected at Weſel on the Rhine, which was conſumed by fire, not without ſuſpicion that it was wilfully deſtroyed. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick, at the head of a ſeparate body, advanced to Nettelen, in the neighbourhood of Munſter, about the middle of May, to watch the motions of the army under Soubiſe, who cauſed three different camps to be formed at Duſſeldorff, Burich, and Rees, though part of his forces ſtill continued in cantonment. The war was in the mean time proſecuted by detached parties, and ſkirmiſhes were fought with various ſucceſs. The army of the duke de Broglio, having croſſed the Dymel about the latter end of June, diſlodged general Sporcken from his poſt on the left of that river, with the loſs of eighteen hundred men taken priſoners, nineteen pieces of cannon, four hundred horſes, and two hundred waggons. After this exploit, the French took poſſeſſion of Warburg, Paderborn, and Dringlebroen, and compelled prince Ferdinand to repaſs the Lippe on the ſecond day of July. Theſe ſucceſſes, however, were over ballanced by the atchievements of ſmall parties, which he detached from time to time to harraſs them in their motions, and cut off their convoys of proviſion. On the thirteenth day of July, in the morning, general Luckner, with his detachment, advanced to Salme, where the count de Chabot was poſted with a ſtrong body of horſe and foot; which he attacked with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were conſtrained to repaſs the Lippe with precipitation, and loſt about two hundred men, and as many horſes, in their retreat. Other parties intercepted the French convoys in the neighbourhood of Caſſel, and did ſuch conſiderable damage to the enemy, that they reſolved to unite their armies, and give battle to prince Ferdinand.

The allies were encamped at Hohenover: the right wing, at the extremity of which the hereditary prince was poſted, extended as far as the village of Buderch, and this was guarded by a detachment. The body of the army occupied the heights of Wambeln; and the prince of Anhalt poſſeſſed the ground between Illingen and Hohenover. The marquis of Granby maintained his poſition on the heights of Kirch-Denckern: lieutenant-general Wutgenau, advancing from the heath of Untrup, marched by his right, in order to reach the village of Kirch-Denckern: the avenues and poſts on the little rivers Aaſt and Sultzbah were defended by the piquets of the army. On the fifteenth day of July, in the evening, the army of Soubiſe, having ſtruck their tents, advanced on the left of the allies, and diſlodged the advanced poſts of lord Granby, againſt whoſe corps their chief effort was directed. Prince Ferdinand now thought proper to make a new diſpoſition. The marquis was commanded to maintain his ground to the laſt extremity. Wutgenau was ordered to make a motion to the left, to block up the high road from Lipſtadt to Ham, and to act in concert with the marquis, whoſe right was moreover ſuſtained by the left of the body commanded by the prince of Anhalt, and this general's own right extended to the Aaſt, above Kirch-Denkern. Lieutenant-general Conway replaced the prince of Anhalt, between Illingen and Hohenover. The hereditary prince ordered lieutenant-general Boſe to ſecure the heights of Wambeln, leaving count Kilmanſegge on the ſide of Buderich. The greateſt part of the artillery was planted by count Shaumbourg Lippe on the front of the left. General Sporcken, who encamped with a ſeparate body at Hortzfeld, was ordered to detach ſix ſquadrons, and as many battalions over the Lippe, to ſupport M. de Wutgenau, and to co-operate with the reſt as he ſhould judge moſt effectual for the advantage of the whole. Lord Granby being furiouſly attacked by the enemy, ſuſtained a prodigious fire of artillery and ſmall arms, and with unſhaken reſolution, withſtood all their efforts until the arrival of Wutgenau; who, advancing on his left, and charging them in flank, obliged them to retire into the woods with precipitation: then he extended his right to Haus-Vilinghauſen, and turned his left towards the high road of Ham, the defence of which place was his chief object.

Prince Ferdinand having learned from the priſoners, that mareſchal Broglio had decamped from Erwite at break of day, in order to join Soubiſe, and give battle to the allies, concluded that the ſtrongeſt efforts would be made upon his left, and took his precautions accordingly. He ordered general Howard to bring up the brigade of infantry commanded by lord Frederick Cavendiſh, and the cavalry of lord Pembroke. Colonel Grevendorff was detached with two battalions to barricade and fortify the village of Kirch-Denckern, and to be there ſupported, in caſe of neceſſity, by general Howard. Mean while, the enemy kept poſſeſſion of ſome poſts oppoſite to the picquets of the allied army, and the patroles ſkirmiſhed all night. At three in the morning the whole French army advanced again to the attack on the ſide where Wutgenau was poſted, and a dreadful fire of cannon and muſquetry was maintained on both ſides for five hours, during which the enemy was not able to gain one inch of ground. About nine, prince Ferdinand receiving information that their deſign was to cannonade the camp of lord Granby from an oppoſite eminence, immediately ordered a body of troops to anticipate this operation, by a vigorous charge. This movement proved deciſive. The troops advanced with amazing intrepidity, and attacked with ſuch vigour as in a little time obliged the enemy to give way, and abandon the field to the allies. Their left, which ſtill maintained a ſevere cannonade on that ſide where the hereditary prince commanded, no ſooner heard of the miſcarriage on their right, than they deſiſted from the attack, and retreated in order. The left of the enemy was purſued as far as Hiltrup, about a league from the field of battle; but as the nature of the ground did not permit the cavalry to act, they ſuſtained the leſs damage in their retreat. In this unſucceſsful attack, they loſt about five thouſand men, killed or taken, with a few colours, and pieces of cannon; whereas the loſs of the allies, in killed and priſoners, did not amount to above five hundred.

This action was the climax of the campaign of 1761 in Weſtphalia. It did the greateſt honour to the wiſdom of the accompliſhed commander in the diſpoſition, and to the bravery of the troops in the combat; but it was far from being deciſive: for, notwithſtanding the loſs of the French, they were ſtill ſuperior in their numbers. On this diſaſter the old miſunderſtanding between Soubiſe and Broglio broke out with freſh animoſity. Narratives, memorials, and replies, conceived with great bitterneſs, were mutually remitted from both mareſchals to their court. Broglio alledged, that his misfortune was owing to the prince de Soubiſe's delay, who did not begin his attack till it was too late for him to continue it. The prince de Soubiſe, on the other hand, affirmed, that Broglio began his attack earlier than the time that had been fixed, in hopes of forcing the allies without Soubiſe's aſſiſtance; and when he found that point loſt, obliged Soubiſe to retreat, that he might not have the honour of retrieving it.

Immediately

Immediately after the action, the two French armies ſeparated, Broglio marched back towards Caſſel; and Soubiſe, retreating to Dortmund, paſſed the Roer; as if they had laid aſide for that campaign all thoughts of acting further on the offenſive. But his paſſage of the Roer was deſigned to ſecure a great number of barges coming down the Rhine, loaden with forage for his army; and before he took this ſtep, he ſent off two large detachments to reinforce Broglio. Having received his forage, he repaſſed both the Roer and the Lippe, and advanced as far as Dulmen; while Broglio, penetrating further into the electorate of Hanover, took poſſeſſion of Keſter, which he fortified, and ſeemed determined to lay ſiege to the town of Hamelen. Prince Ferdinand, being greatly inferior in number, retired to Dumolt, and called in moſt of his detachments. The French general encamped in his neighbourhood, on the heights of Neim, and many ſkirmiſhes happened; in one of which prince Henry, brother to the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, was mortally wounded. About the middle of Auguſt an advantage was gained at Caſſel by general Luckner, who attacked and routed a body of the enemy, from whom he took a conſiderable number of men and horſes.

Mareſchal Broglio having croſſed the Weſer with his whole army, as if he had intended to fall upon the city of Hanover, prince Ferdinand made a forced march, paſſed the Dymel, and advanced to Caſſel. This movement obliged the French general to retire with the greater part of his army: then prince Ferdinand, proceeding to Paderborn, eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Buhne, from whence he extended his forces towards Hamelen. Broglio once more paſſed the Weſer, encamped near Eimbeck, and laid the whole country under contribution. In the mean time, Soubiſe having erected his ovens at Dorſten, and garriſoned the place with one battalion, the hereditary prince found means to attack and reduce the town, to make priſoners of the garriſon, to deſtroy the ovens, and burn the magazines there provided: an exploit, in conſequence of which the prince de Soubiſe retreated to the other ſide of the Lippe; but he ſoon repaſſed that river, and advanced again towards Caeffelt, from whence his detachments over-ran all the northern parts of Weſtphalia.

While prince Ferdinand lay encamped at Willhemſtall in the neighbourhood of Hamelen, and the hereditary prince, at the head of a detachment, ſcoured the open country of Heſſe-Caſſel, the mareſchal Broglio made reprizals in the Hartz, where he reduced and diſmantled the ſtrong caſtle of Schutzfels, and made the garriſon priſoners of war. A detachment, commanded by his brother the count de Broglio, and prince Xavier of Saxony, having made a forced march, took poſſeſſion of Wolfenbuttle, and then laid ſiege to Brunſwick; but before they could reduce the city, the hereditary prince being joined by general Luckner, flew to the relief of his father's capital. At his approach they relinquiſhed their enterprize, and retired out of Wolfenbuttle with ſuch precipitation as to leave ſome of their cannon behind, and about five hundred men, who were taken.

Towards the end of September, a detachment from the army of Soubiſe, commanded by the marquis de Conflans, advanced to the gates of Embden, which was garriſoned by two companies of Engliſh invalids, who obtained an honourable capitulation, and embarked from Bremen: then the French troops laid the town under contribution, and evacuated the place; but the boors of the country riſing in arms, and ſinking the pontoons on which the enemy had paſſed the river, the French general ſent a ſecond detachment, which brought off the firſt, after having diſperſed and hanged ſome of the peaſants in terrorem. Another party from the army of Soubiſe entered the city of Oſnabrug, which the ſoldiers were permitted to pillage, as the inhabitants could not pay the exorbitant contribution which was demanded. A third made an attempt upon Bremen; but the inhabitants joining the garriſon, obliged the French to retreat with precipitation; and they were afterwards reinforced by two battalions of the Britiſh legion, the better to ſecure the magazines depoſited in that place for the uſe of the allied army.

In the mean time Broglio lay inactive at Eimbeck, without attempting any thing of importance; nor was he at all diſturbed in his poſition, until the beginning of November, when prince Ferdinand had concerted a plan for attacking him ſuddenly, before he could call in his detachments; or, at leaſt, to intercept and cut off a large body of fifteen battalions poſted at Eſcherſhauſen, under the command of Monſ. de Chabot. For this purpoſe he ordered the hereditary prince and general Luckner, reinforced by the garriſon of Wolfenbuttle, to advance from their reſpective poſts, ſo as to be in the neighbourhood of Eimbeck, at a certain hour on the fifth of November. He commanded the marquis of Granby to force the French poſt at Cappelnhagen on the fourth; to proceed next day to Wickenſen, and block up a defile in that neighbourhood, on the road from Eſcherſhauſen to Eimbeck. He ſent general Hardenberg with a detachment to paſs the Weſer at Badenwerder, that he might at the appointed time take poſſeſſion of a defile at Amelunxhorn, on the other road from Eſcherſhauſen to Eimbeck.

Having taken the neceſſary precautions, he himſelf, with the main body of his army, croſſed the Weſer on the fourth near Haſtenbeck, and advanced towards Eimbeck; but, when he approached Wickenſen, he found the road occupied by a ſtrong body of Britiſh grenadiers and Highlanders: for the marquis of Granby had gallantly forced the enemy's poſt at Cappelnhagen, and blocked up the defile by the hour appointed. Chabot, perceiving himſelf intercepted, retreated immediately towards Eſcherſhauſen, and ſtruck into the other road to Eimbeck, which general Hardenberg had been ordered to ſecure: but in his march to Badenwerder, ſome of his pontoons were overturned, and this accident retarded him ſo long, that he did not arrive at the place appointed until ſeven in the morning; and by that time Chabot had paſſed the defile in his way to Eimbeck, which he reached at noon, without further interruption. Thus the plan miſcarried; and this muſt frequently be the fate of ſuch ſchemes as depend upon a variety of incidents.

Prince Ferdinand, notwithſtanding the diſappointment, advanced toward the French camp, which he found too ſtrong to be attacked with any proſpect of ſucceſs. Then he reſolved to turn their their flanks, as if he deſigned to cut off their communication with Gottingen; a motion which, he knew, would either bring Broglio to an engagement on equal terms, or oblige him to retreat. The laſt part of the alternative he choſe to embrace, and on the ninth retired with his whole army. This was the laſt tranſaction of any conſequence that happened between the oppoſite armies in Weſtphalia. Broglio quartered his forces in Caſſel, and that neighbourhood. The troops of Soubiſe were diſtributed at Duſſeldorp, and along the Lower Rhine. The allies fixed their quarters at Hildersham, Munſter, Hamelen, and Eimbeck. The Britiſh cavalry wintered in Eaſt Frieſland, and the infantry in the biſhopric of Oſnabrug.

We have already obſerved, that the laſt campain had ended more to the advantage of his Pruſſian majeſty than the preceding one had done; for thoſe two great victories of Lignitz and Torgau, with which he then cloſed his operations, had not only reſcued his affairs in Sileſia and Saxony from impending deſtruction, but had enlarged his field for recruiting, and prepared him, in all appearance, for more early and vigorous action, than could have been expected in any of the foregoing campaigns. But every one was ſurpriſed to obſerve, that this year he had altered the ſyſtem of his conduct. An inactivity and languor was diffuſed over all his operations. He ſeemed to have adopted the caution and ſlowneſs, which had been ſo long oppoſed to his vivacity by M. Daun. The ſummer was almoſt wholly ſpent, and the king of Pruſſia had ſcarcely been mentioned. Whatever was the cauſe of this inactivity, whether it proceeded from the difficulty of providing forage, or from an opinion entertained by his Pruſſian majeſty, that it was moſt for his intereſt to remain on the defenſive, we ſhall not pretend to determine. Certain it is, he himſelf, with one part of his forces, continued quietly in a very ſtrong camp in Upper Sileſia, while his brother prince Henry, with the other, was no leſs ſecurely poſted under the walls of Leipſic, in the neighbourhood of count Daun the Auſtrian general.

While the main armies were thus diſpoſed, their partizans exerted themſelves, as uſual, in bold and ſudden incurſions. In the beginning of April the Pruſſian majors-general Schenkendorff and Sybourg, advancing with a body of troops from Gera towards Neuſtadt on the Orla, continued their march to Saalfield, where they attacked an Auſtrian detachment commanded by general Kleiſt, who was routed with conſiderable loſs. They likewiſe diſlodged a body of the army of the Empire from the village of Scwartz, which they had ſecured with two battalions, as a poſt of importance. In this expedition the Pruſſians took ſeveral pieces of cannon, colours, waggons loaded with baggage and ammunition, and above eleven hundred men, including two and thirty officers. After this exploit, the Pruſſian generals ſent a detachment to attack the corps under general Guaſco near Plaune in Voightland, who, after a ſharp diſpute, was forced to retire with the loſs of four pieces of cannon, and all his baggage. Other petty advantages of the ſame kind were obtained in the beginning of ſummer by the Pruſſian detachments; but the king in perſon undertook nothing of conſequence in the field.

In Pomerania the Swedes were not in motion till the month of Auguſt, when prince Henry, having received information that they had begun to advance towards the Pruſſian territories, detached general Stutterheim to join colonel Belling in that country with a few battalions, at whoſe approach the enemy retreated. It was in the beginning of the ſame month, that the army of the empire advancing in Saxony as if they deſigned to attack Leipſic, prince Henry ſent general Seydlitz with a detachment of ſeven thouſand men, who fell upon them with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were obliged to give way, and retreated with great precipitation to a conſiderable diſtance from the Pruſſian cantonments, which they never afterwards preſumed to approach.

The Ruſſian miniſtry, having been long ſenſible of the inconveniencies to which their operations were ſubject from their great diſtance from the ſcene of action, determined, if poſſible, to reduce Colberg, which would ſerve as a magazine and a key to Pomerania. With this view general Romanzoff was detached, in the month of July, with a conſiderable body of forces to inveſt that fortreſs by land, while it ſhould be blocked up by ſea by a ſtrong ſquadron, in which an additional number of troops with the artillery and warlike ſtores were tranſported. This was joined by the Swediſh fleet in Auguſt, and Romanzoff began to cannonade the place; but, as he did not open the trenches in a regular manner, as the town was ſtrongly fortified and defended by a numerous garriſon, under the command of an accompliſhed officer; as the Ruſſians were little accuſtomed to ſieges, and the ſeaſon was very far advanced, the Pruſſian monarch hoped it would hold out until the froſt ſhould ſet in, and render the approaches of the enemy impracticable. The Swedes, at the ſame time, ſeemed to ſecond the operations of their allies. Their army in weſtern Pomerania, having received a reinforcement, began to advance again toward the Pruſſian territories, and ſkirmiſhed with Stutterheim; but no enterprize of importance was undertaken on either ſide.

The main Ruſſian army, commanded by Butterlin, could not take the field till the ſeaſon was far advanced. In May, however, a detachment marced towards Sileſia without artillery, and formed a camp at Bojanovo: another body eſtabliſhed a conſiderable magazine at Poſen; a third, under count Tottleben, entered Pomerania in the beginning of June, and made a furious attack upon Belgarde, from whence he was repulſed with conſiderable loſs. After this miſcarriage, he ſent out detachments as far as the frontiers of the New Marche, where they took poſſeſſion of Landſberg upon the Wartha. In the month of Auguſt, while the head-quarters of the Pruſſian monarch were at Strehlen, the Ruſſian general Czernicheff advanced, with the van-gard of that army to Wohlau; and the Coſſacks, with other light troops, paſſing the Oder, ravaged the country in the neighbourhood of Jauer. Another detachment, more powerful, penetrated into Sileſia as far as Breſlau, and began to cannonade that capital: but lieutenant-general Tawſein, who commanded the garriſon, being reinforced by a body of troops under major-general Knoblock, marched out of the place, and attacked the enemy with ſuch reſolution, that they abandoned their batteries and decamped, camped, after having ſuffered conſiderable damage.

At length general Butturlin advanced with the grand army of the Ruſſians: and, notwithſtanding all the vigilance and activity of the Pruſſian king, whoſe motions and meaſures for ſome time prevented their junction with the Auſtrian army under Laudohn, this was in the end effected; and now his affairs ſeemed altogether deſperate. Yet, far from being abandoned by his wonted fortitude, he had recourſe to expedients, which ſeem to have diſappointed the deſigns of his enemies. He detached a conſiderable body of forces into Poland under the command of general Platen, whoſe motions were conducted with ſuch ſecreſy and expedition, that he burned three Ruſſian magazines in that kingdom, before the object of his march was known; and the great magazine at Poſen narrowly eſcaped the ſame fate. Immediately after this atchievement, general Butturlin ſeparated the main body of his army from the Auſtrians, and retreated towards Poland: yet he left general Czernicheff with a conſiderable body of forces to act in concert with Laudohn, who, about this juncture, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by an extraordinary exploit, which proved very detrimental to the Pruſſian monarch's affairs.

Scheweidnitz, which had changed maſters more than once in the courſe of this war, he conſidered as the moſt valuable place that remained to him in Sileſia. It was central in its ſituation, ſtrongly fortified, and contained a great magazine of military ſtores and artillery. Laudohn laid a plan for reducing it by ſurprize, and it was ſoon crowned with unexpected ſucceſs. On the firſt day of October, at three in the morning, the troops allotted for this ſervice advanced to the attack in four different places, and, under the favour of a thick fog, not only approached, but even fixed their ſcaling ladders, before they were diſcovered by the garriſon, who ſcarce had time to fire a few cannon at the aſſailants. The conteſt, however, was maintained for ſome time with ſmall arms, until a powder magazine in one of the outworks blew up, and about three hundred men on each ſide were deſtroyed by the exploſion. The Auſtrians, taking advantage of the confuſion produced by this accident, advanced to the body of the place, and burſting open the gates, entered the town without much oppoſition. At day-break they found themſelves maſters of the place; and the governor, lieutenant-general Zaſtrow, with all his garriſon, amounting to three thouſand men, were made priſoners. Thus Laudohn, at the expence of about ſix hundred men who fell in the attack, took above five times that number; and made himſelf maſter of a ſtrong important fortreſs, in which he found a vaſt magazine of meal, and a numerous train of artillery. The king of Pruſſia could not but ſeverely feel this ſtroke, which was equal to a defeat in the open field: but he bore his loſs with fortitude, contenting himſelf with declaring, he would ſuſpend his opinion of Zaſtrow's conduct, until he ſhould be better informed of the particulars. In the mean time, this event obliged him to alter his poſition, and draw nearer to Breſlau.

In the beginning of December he there cantoned his army, and the Auſtrian forces were quartered in the neighbourhood of Scheweidnitz. Immediately before the king repaired to Breſlau, he had the good fortune to diſcover a conſpiracy, which was formed againſt his perſon by the baron de Warkotch, a man of conſiderable rank and fortune in Sileſia, and one Francis Schmedt, a prieſt. Their intention was to ſeize the king when he ſhould come forth unattended, and conduct him to the Auſtrian camp; a ſcheme, in which it is confidently affirmed, they were both encouraged and aſſiſted by the court of Vienna. The diſcovery was made by one of the baron's domeſtics, who, being intruſted with a letter from the baron to the eccleſiaſtic, and ſuſpecting the contents, delivered it to the Pruſſian monarch. Thus the myſtery was unravelled: a detachment was immediately ſent to apprehend the baron, and ſeize all his papers. Both were accordingly ſecured; but he afterwards found means to eſcape through a window. His lady was, however, detained in cuſtody. Schmedt having likewiſe conſulted his ſafety by flight, the king cauſed them to be cited to appear by the twenty-firſt day of January, to anſwer the charge brought againſt them, on pain of forfeiting their lives and eſtates.

In the month of November the mareſchal count Daun, having received a large reinforcement from the army of Laudohn, formed a plan for attacking the ſtrong camp of prince Henry of Pruſſia, in the neighbourhood of Meiſſen. An attempt was accordingly made, and ſome of the Pruſſian advanced poſts were carried; but the enemy ſoon met with ſuch a vigorous reſiſtance, that their general thought proper to abandon the enterprize, and return to his camp. He then cantoned his forces, in the neighbourhood of Dreſden, while the Imperial army was put into quarters at Naumburg and Zwickaw. Theſe motions induced prince Henry to diſtribute his troops alſo in quarters of cantonment, extending on the right, to Meiſſen, and on the left, to Katzenhauſen.

The great Ruſſian army retreated beyond the Viſtula; but the corps under Romanzoff ſtill continued before Colberg, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the prince of Wurtemburg, whom the king of Pruſſia had ſent to head his forces in Pomerania. The blockade had for ſome time been turned into a regular ſiege; and colonel Heyde who commanded the garriſon, made a very obſtinate defence. In the beginning of October, the boiſterous weather obliged the Swediſh ſquadron to retire. A Ruſſian ſhip of the line was wrecked, and all the crew periſhed: their hoſpital ſhip was accidentally ſet on fire and deſtroyed: in a word, the Ruſſian fleet likewiſe withdrew, and returned to Cronſtadt; and then the garriſon of Colberg received a large ſupply of proviſion from Stetin. Theſe circumſtances concurring with the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, it was thought would compel even the Ruſſians to quit the field, and at any rate render the proſecution of the ſige impracticable; but Romanzoff ſeemed to ſet the winter at defiance, and carried on his operations with unremitting vigour, until he made himſelf maſter of a ſmall fort that commanded the harbour. By means of this acquiſition he cut off the garriſon of Colberg from all communication by ſea; ſo that they were in danger of periſhing by famine, when colonel Heyde ſurrendered, on the ſeventeenth day of December. This important conqueſt enabled the Ruſſian miniſtry to ſupply and reinforce their armies in Germany by ſea. It likewiſe ſecured to them all the eaſtern part of Pomerania, where accordingly Romanzoff's forces were diſtributed for the winter; his own head-quarters being eſtabliſhed at Stargat, about twenty miles from Stetin.

Before we conclude the foreign tranſactions of this year, it may not be improper to take notice of an accident, that fully demonſtrates the extreme regard, which the Chriſtian powers pay to the Ottoman Porte. In the courſe of the preceding year, a large Turkiſh ſhip of the line, called the Ottoman Crown, was ſeized by the Chriſtian ſlaves on board, who roſe upon the Turks, and, having overpowered them, brought the ſhip into Malta; where, according to cuſtom, the prize was divided among the captors. The Porte demanded the reſtitution of the ſhip in the moſt inſolent terms; and the knights of Malta, who are at perpetual war with the infidels, treated this demand with contempt. The grand ſignior, incenſed at the refuſal, ſent a public manifeſto to Naples by the capuchins of Tunis, in which he bitterly complained of the Malteſe knights, and threatened their total extirpation; at the ſame time he began to equip a formidable fleet of ſhips and galleys: but as he cauſed large quantities of warlike ſtores to be tranſported by the Black Sea to the mouth of the Danube, and a rumour prevailed that he had lately concluded a treaty of alliance with the Pruſſian monarch, certain powers ſuſpected that he harboured ſome other deſign, under the pretext of an armament againſt Malta. The empreſs queen of Hungary, to avoid any occaſion of giving umbrage to the grand ſignior, forbad all the knights of Malta reſiding in her dominions, to repair to the defence of that iſland, in caſe it ſhould be attacked: a circumſtance that plainly evinces the extreme awe, in which the court of Vienna ſtood of the Ottoman Porte. The French king acted with no leſs caution and ſtill more delicacy and prudence. He purchaſed the Turkiſh ſhip which had been taken, and ſent it to Conſtantinople as a preſent to the ſultan. It was protected in the voyage by the Britiſh cruiſers; and the grand ſignior was pleaſed to ſignify that he was fully ſatisfied.

Let us return now to the proſecution of the war at home.

Even from the beginning of winter, the ſingle ſhips that cruiſed in the Channel were conducted with ſuch prudence and circumſpection, that they made prize of a great number of French privateers; a circumſtance that demonſtrated their own vigilance and the enemy's activity. In the month of January captain Elphinſton, commander of the Richmond, mounted with thirty two guns, fell in with the Felicité, a French frigate, of the ſame force, off the coaſt of Holland; and a ſevere engagement began about ten in the morning, near S' Graveſande, about eight miles from the Hague, to which place the prince of Orange, general York the Britiſh envoy, and the count d'Affry the French ambaſſador, repaired with a great multitude of people, to behold the progreſs and iſſue of the battle. About noon both ſhips ran aſhore: nevertheleſs the action was ſtill maintained, until the enemy deſerted their quarters: they afterwards abandoned the ſhip, which was entirely deſtroyed, after having loſt their captain and about one hundred men, who fell in the diſpute. The Richmond ſoon floated, without any damage; and the victory coſt her but three men killed, and thirteen wounded. The French court loudy exclaimed againſt this attack as a violation of the Dutch neutrality, and demanded ſignal ſatisfaction for the inſult and damage they had ſuſtained. Accordingly the States-General made ſome remonſtrances to the court of London, which found means to remove all miſunderſtanding on this ſubject. The Felicité was bound for Martinique, with a cargo valued at thirty thouſand pounds, in company with the Hermione, another frigate of the ſame force and value, which ſuffered ſhipwreck on the coaſt of Dunkirk.

In the courſe of the ſame month, captain Hood, commander of the Minerva frigate, cruiſing in the chops of the Channel, deſcried a great ſhip of two decks ſteering to the weſtward; and found it was the Warwick, an Engliſh ſhip, which had carried ſixty cannon, and been taken by the enemy. She was now mounted with thirty-five guns, and commanded by Mr. le Verger da Belair, with a commiſſion from the French king. Her crew amounted to about three hundred men, including a detachment of ſoldiers; and ſhe was bound to Pondicherry in the Eaſt Indies. Captain Hood, notwithſtanding her ſuperior ſize, attacked her without heſitation, and was very warmly received. Several maſts in both ſhips were ſhot away, and they fell foul of one another, while the ſea ran very high; ſo that the crews on both ſides were greatly encumbered by their broken maſts and ſhattered rigging. At length the waves ſeparated them, and the Warwick fell to leeward. Captain Hood, having cleared ſhip, bore directly down upon the enemy: then the engagement was renewed, and laſted about an hour; at the expiration of which the captain of the Warwick ſtruck his colours, having loſt about fourteen men killed outright, beſides thirty wounded. The loſs in number of men was equal on board the Minerva, and all her maſts went by the board: nevertheleſs the prize was brought in triumph to Spithead. In the progreſs of the ſame cruize captain Hood had alſo taken the Ecurneil privateer from Bayonne, of fourteen guns, and one hundred and twenty-two men.

On the thirteenth day of March, another French ſhip, called the Entreprenant, pierced for forty-four guns, but mounted with twenty-ſix only, having two hundred and three men on board, and a rich cargo, bound for St. Domingo, was encountered near the Land's-end by the Vengeance frigate of twenty-ſix guns, commanded by captain Nightingale. The action was maintained on both ſides with uncommon fury, until the Vengeance being ſet on fire by the enemy's wadding, the French reſolved to take advantage of the confuſion produced by this accident, and running their bowſprit upon the taffaril of the Engliſh frigate attempted to board her. In this deſign, however, they miſcarried, through the activity of captain Nightingale, who found means to diſengage himſelf, and ſheered off to repair his rigging, which had greatly ſuffered in the engagement. The ſhip was no ſooner in proper condition than he ranged up again cloſe to the enemy, and renewed the conteſt, which laſted a full hour: then then the Entreprenant bore away. Captain Nightingale, though a ſecond time diſabled in his maſts and rigging, wore ſhip, ran within piſtol-ſhot, and began a third vigorous attack, which laſted an hour and a half before the enemy called for quarter. Fifteen of their men were killed, and about twice that number wounded. The victors loſt about half as many.

In April another French frigate, called the Comete of two and thirty guns, and two hundred and fifty men, juſt ſailed from Breſt, was taken to the weſtward of Uſhant by the Bedford, an Engliſh ſhip of the line, commanded by captain Deane, who conveyed her in ſafety to Plymouth. About the ſame period, and near the ſame place, a fourth frigate of the enemy, called the Pheaſant, manned with one hundred and twenty-five mariners, was engaged, taken, and brought to Spithead, by captain Brograve commander of the Albany ſloop, whoſe victory was the cheaper, as the crew of the Pheaſant had thrown fourteen of their guns over board during the chace. In the courſe of the ſame month a large Eaſt India ſhip fitted out from France with twenty-eight guns, and three hundred and fifty men, fell in with the Hero and the Venus, commanded by the captains Forteſcue and Harriſon, and, being taken without oppoſition, were carried into Plymouth.

The cruizers belonging to the ſquadron commanded by vice admiral Saunders in the Mediterranean, exerted themſelves with no leſs ſpirit and activity. In the beginning of this very month, the Oriflame, a French ſhip of forty guns, being off Cape Tres Foreas, was diſcovered by the Iſis, under the command of captain Wheeler, who overtook her at ſix in the evening, and a running fight was maintained until half an hour after ten. Captain Wheeler being unfortunately ſlain in the beginning of the action, the command devolved upon lieutenant Cunningham, who obſerving at length that the enemy's deſign was to reach the Spaniſh ſhore, boarded her without heſitation; and in a little time, her commander ſubmitting, ſhe was brought into the bay of Gibraltar. The number of her killed and wounded amounted to forty-five, out of a complement of three hundred and ſeventy: the loſs of the Iſis did not exceed four killed and nine wounded.

In July another exploit was atchieved by a ſmall detachment from the ſquadron commanded by the ſame admiral. Captain Proby, in the Thunderer, together with the Modeſte, Thetis, and Favourite ſloop, being ordered to cruize upon the coaſt of Spain, with a view to intercept the Achilles and Bouffon, two French ſhips of war, which lay in the harbour of Cadiz: they at length ventured to come forth, and on the ſixteenth day of the month were diſcovered by the Britiſh cruizers. About midnight the Thunderer came up with the Achilles, which ſtruck after a warm engagement of half an hour: yet, in this ſhort action, captain Proby had near forty men killed, and above one hundred wounded, he himſelf having ſuſtained a ſlight hurt in the right arm. About ſeven in the ſame morning the Thetis attacked the Bouffon, and the fire was maintained on both ſides with great reſolution for half an hour, when the Modeſte ranging up, and firing a few guns, the French captain ſubmitted. His ſhip and her conſort ſuffered conſiderably, both in their crews and rigging; nevertheleſs, the victors carried them ſafely into the bay of Gibraltar.

One of the moſt remarkable and gallant actions that diſtinguiſhed this war, and fully proved the vaſt ſuperiority which the Engliſh had over the French in point of naval diſcipline, was an incident with which I ſhall now entertain the reader. On Monday the 10th of Auguſt, captain Faulkner of the Bellona, a ſhip of the line, and captain Logie of the Brilliant, a frigate of thirty guns, ſailed from the river Tagus for England, having on board a conſiderable ſum of money for the merchants of London. On Thurſday in the afternoon, being then off Vigo, they deſcried three ſail of ſhips ſtanding in for the land, one of the line of battle, and two frigates. They no ſooner obſerved captain Faulkner, than they bore down upon him, until within the diſtance of ſeven miles, when ſeeing the Bellona and the frigate through the magnifying medium of a hazy atmoſphere, they miſtook them both for two-decked ſhips, and dreading the iſſue of an engagement, reſolved to decline the encounter. For this purpoſe they ſuddenly wore round, filled all their ſails, and crouded away.

Captain Faulkner being by this time convinced of their ſize, and conjecturing, from the intelligence he had received, that the large ſhip was the Courageux, which was actually the caſe, he hoiſted all the canvas he could carry, and gave chace until ſun-ſet, when one of the French frigates hauling out in the offing, he diſplayed a ſignal to the Brilliant to purſue in that direction; and his order was immediately obeyed. They kept ſight of the enemy during the whole night, and at ſun-riſe, had gained but about two miles upon them in a chace of fourteen hours; ſo that the French commodore might have ſtill ſhunned an engagement for the whole day, and enjoyed the chance of eſcaping in the darkneſs of the ſucceeding night; but he no longer declined the action. The air being perfectly ſerene, he now perceived that one of the Engliſh ſhips was a frigate; and the Bellona herſelf, which was one of the beſt conſtituted ſhips in the Engliſh navy, appeared to him, at a diſtance, to be conſiderably ſmaller than ſhe really was. The French commander therefore, being a man of ſpirit, hoiſted a red enſign on the mizen ſhrouds, as a ſignal for his two frigates to cloſe with, and engage the Brilliant. At the ſame time he hauled down his ſtudding-ſails, wore round, and ſtood for the Bellona under his top-ſails; while captain Faulkner advanced towards her with an eaſy ſail, and ordered his quarters to be manned.

The ſea was undulated by a gentle breeze, which facilitated the working of the ſhips, and at the ſame time permitted the full uſe of their heavy artillery. The two ſhips were equal in burthen, in number of guns, and in weight of metal. The crew on board of the Courageux, amounted to ſeven hundred men, able to ſtand to their quarters; and they were commanded by M. du Guy Lambert, an officer of approved valour and ability. The Bellona's complement conſiſted of five hundred and fifty choſen men, accuſtomed to diſcipline, and inured to ſervice. All the officers were gentlemen of known merit, and the commander had on many occaſions diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and conduct. The fire on both ſides was ſuſpended until they were within muſket-ſhot of each other, and then the engagement began with a dreadful diſcharge of fire-arms and artillery. In leſs than nine minutes, all the Bellona's braces, bowlings, ſhrowds, and rigging were cut and ſhattered by the ſhot, and the mizen-maſt fell over the ſtern, with all the men on the round top, who, nevertheleſs ſaved their lives, by clambering into the port-holes of the gun-room.

Capt. Faulkner, apprehenſive that the enemy might ſeize this opportunity of eſcaping, gave orders to board them immediately; an attempt which the poſition of the two ſhips ſoon rendered altogether impracticable. The Courageux was now falling athwart the fore-foot, or bows of the Bellona, in which caſe the Engliſh ſhip muſt have been raked fore and aft with great execution. The haul yards, and moſt of the other ropes by which the Bellona could be worked, were already ſhot away. Captain Faulkner, however, with the aſſiſtance of his maſter, made uſe of the ſtudding ſails with ſuch dexterity, as to wear the ſhip quite round, and fall upon the oppoſite quarter of the Courageux. His preſence of mind and activity in this delicate ſituation, were not more admirable than the diſcipline and diſpatch of his officers and men, who obſerving this change in their poſition, flew to the guns on the other ſide, now oppoſed to the enemy, from whence they poured in a moſt terrible diſcharge, and maintained it without intermiſſion or abatement. Every ſhot took place, and bore deſtruction along with it. The ſides of the Courageux were ſhattered and torn by every ſucceſſive broadſide, and her decks were ſtrewed with carnage. About twenty minutes did the enemy ſuſtain the havock made by this battery, ſo inceſſantly plied, and ſo fatally directed. At length it became ſo intolerable, that the French enſign was hauled down: the rage of battle ceaſed: the Engliſh mariners had left their quarters, and the officers congratulated each other on the ſucceſs of the day. At this juncture a ſhot being unexpectedly fired from the lower tier of the Courageux, the Britiſh ſeamen ran to their quarters, and, without orders, poured in two broadſides upon the enemy, who now called for quarter, and an end was put to the engagement.

The damage done to the rigging of the Bellona was conſiderable, but ſhe ſuffered very little in the hull, and the number of the killed and wounded did not exceed forty. The caſe was very different with the Courageux, which now appeared like a wreck upon the water. Nothing was ſeen ſtanding but her foremaſt, and bowſprit; large breaches were made in her ſides: her decks were torn up in ſeveral parts; many of her guns were diſmounted; and her quarters were filled with the mangled bodies of the dying and the dead. Above two hundred and twenty were killed outright, and half that number was brought aſhore wounded to Liſbon, to which place the prize was conducted. Captain Faulkner was not more commendable for his gallantry in the action, than for the humanity and politeneſs with which he treated his priſoners, whoſe grateful acknowledgment, and unſolicited applauſe, conſtitute the faireſt teſtimony that a man of honour can receive. Nor ought we to with-hold our praiſe from captain Logie, of the Brilliant, to whoſe valour and dexterity the ſucceſs of the commodore was, in a great meaſure owing. Finding it would be impoſſible for him to acquire any thing but laurels from two frigates, the leaſt of which was equal in ſtrength to the ſhip he commanded; he reſolved to amuſe them both, ſo as to prevent either from aſſiſting the Courageux. He accordingly began the action by engaging one of them, called la Malicieuſe. The other coming up, he withſtood their joint efforts, ſo as to employ their whole fire, while the great ſhips were engaged, and even above half an hour after the Courageux had ſtruck her colours. Finally, he obliged them both to ſheer off, and to conſult their ſafety in flight, after they had ſuffered conſiderably in their maſts and rigging.

Captain Faulkner returned to Lisbon with this prize, which had well nigh periſhed by accident, before he reached the Tagus. A caſk of ſpirituous liquor catching fire near one of the magazines, the ſhip muſt have blown up, had not ſhe been ſaved by the preſence of mind and reſolution of Mr. Male, the firſt lieutenant. Perceiving the flames already communicated to ſome combuſtibles that happened to be in the way, he leaped down the hatch-way into the midſt of them, and by his perſonal endeavours, they were happily extinguiſhed. The centinel who had kindled the fire by admitting a candle too near the ſpirits, was burned to death; and twenty French priſoners hearing the alarm, leaped into the ſea, where they periſhed. When the French arrived at Lisbon, they applied to their own conſul for relief, but without any effect: the gentlemen, therefore, of the Engliſh factory, moved with compaſſion for their ſufferings, and their deſtitute ſituation, generouſly raiſed a ſubſcription of two hundred and thirty pounds ſterling, for their ſupport.

No other advantage of importance, was obtained over the enemy in this part of the world; but ſome ſucceſsful exploits were performed in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies. After the reduction of Pondicherry on the coaſt of Coromandel, an armament was equipped againſt the French ſettlement of Mahie, ſituated on the coaſt of Malabar, about thirty miles to the northward of Tillicherry. A body of forces was embarked at Bombay for this expedition, under the command of major Hector Monro, who took his meaſures ſo well, in concert with Mr. Hodges, commander for the Engliſh at Tillicherry, and acted with ſo much ſpirit in the execution of the ſcheme, that in the beginning of February, Mr. Louer, commander in chief of the French garriſon at Mahie, ſurrendered the place with all its dependencies. Though this acquiſition was of no great conſequence to the Engliſh, merely as a trading port, the loſs of it was ſeverely felt by the enemy, who had fortified it at a conſiderable expence, and mounted the fortifications with above two hundred pieces of cannon.

The French officers in the Eaſt-Indies, notwithſtanding the loſs of Pondicherry, exerted themſelves with ſo much induſtry, as to intereſt in their cauſe a prince of the Mogul empire, called the Shah Zadda, who took the field at the head of fourſcore thouſand men, againſt the forces of the Engliſh Eaſt-India company, commanded by major John Carnack, and reinforced by the ſuba of Bengal. This whole army conſiſted of five hundred Europeans, two thouſand five hundred ſepoys, and twenty thouſand black troops, with twelve pieces of cannon. Both armies advanced to the neighbourhood of Guya, and on the fifteenth day of January the Mogul troops were routed in a pitched battle. All their artillery was taken, together with part of their baggage, and a number of French officers, including Mr. Law, their principal commander. The ſhah made an effort to join two rajas, who had taken up arms againſt the ſuba; but, receiving intelligence, that they were already defeated by the Engliſh troops, he ſurrendered at diſcretion to the ſuba, who treated him with great reſpect, and promiſed, with the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh company, to ſupport him in his pretenſions to the Mogul empire.

This ſeries of proſperity could hardly be ſaid to be interrupted by the ſucceſsful attempts of the count d'Eſtaign, who, with a ſmall ſquadron, had, in the year 1759, made himſelf maſter of the Engliſh fort of Bender-Abaſſi, in the gulph of Perſia, and taken two frigates, with three other veſſels belonging to the company. In the ſucceeding year the fort of Natal ſurrendered to him at diſcretion, and he found two ſhips in the road. After theſe exploits, he ſailed to Sumatra, where he reduced Bencouli, Tapanopoli, and Marlborough fort; which laſt, though in a good ſtate of defence, was, after a very weak reſiſtance, given up by the garriſon. This bold adventurer, however, could not derive ſo much honour from the ſucceſs of his expedition, as diſgrace from having made it contrary to the moſt ſacred laws of arms; for, at this period, it is well known he was no other than a priſoner on parole. Neither did the Engliſh intereſt ſuffer any thing from a revolution, which was, at this time, effected, in favour of Mir Coſſim Ali Kawn, who was placed on the throne of Bengal in the room of his father-in-law Jaffier Ali Cawn, who had been raiſed to that dignity by the celebrated lord Clive, and who was now depoſed for his cruelty and mal-adminiſtration. On the contrary, the privileges and immunities of the Engliſh company were confirmed and enlarged by the new nabob.

In the courſe of the preceding month a ſevere blow was given to the Dutch company ſettled at the iſland of Ceylon, lying off Cape Comorin, the extremity of the peninſula of Indus. This company, having diſcontinued the payment of certain duties demanded by the king of Candia, and being ſuſpected of a deſign to render that kingdom tributary to their power; the prince marched with a conſiderable army againſt their ſettlements; ſurpriſed Point de Galle, and having taken Colombo, their principal eſtabliſhment, maſſacred all that were found in it, without diſtinction of ſex or age. Then he ordered his troops to hew down all the cinnamon and other ſpice trees that grew in that part of the country to which the European traders had acceſs, and threatened to extirpate every Dutch family from the iſland.

During this campaign the Engliſh arms were no leſs ſucceſsful in America than in Aſia. In the beginning of July, colonel Grant, at the head of two thouſand ſix hundred men, began his march from Fort Prince George, on the frontiers of Carolina, for the country of the Cherokees, which he determined to ravage with fire and ſword. On the tenth day of the month, he was attacked on his march by a body of Indians, who fired for ſome time with great vivacity, but little effect; and then diſappeared. After this attempt he met with no oppoſition in traverſing their country. He reduced fifteen towns to aſhes, beſides little villages and farm-houſes; deſtroyed about fourteen hundred acres of corn, drove the inhabitants to ſtarve in the mountains, and filled their whole nation with diſmay.

This terror produced the deſired effect, and compelled them to ſue for peace. A deputation of their chiefs waited on the colonel, to explain their diſtreſſes, and ſignify their ſentiments on the ſubject, and he forwarded them to the lieutenant-governor at Charles-Town, where a new treaty was actually concluded. Sir William Johnſon made a tour round the other Indian nations, in order to quiet their fears, arouſed at the conqueſts of Great-Britain; which fears the French emiſſaries had fomented with their uſual induſtry and ſucceſs. A conference was held between the Six Nations and ſome of the American governors, in order to ratify the treaties ſubſiſting with thoſe tribes; but a warm diſpute aroſe from a demand of certain lands, made by a Delaware chief, who complained that the Engliſh ſettlers had taken poſſeſſion of them in conſequence of a fraudulent purchaſe; and tho' the riſing animoſity was ſtifled for the preſent, it ſoon gave occaſion to thoſe barbarous maſſacres, which were afterwards committed by theſe ſavages. The more northern Indians, ſettled on the frontiers of Nova Scotia, ſeemed extremely well-pleaſed with their new protectors and allies. Their chiefs in great numbers viſited the governor of Halifax, owned their dependance on the king of Great-Britain, and, in token of perpetual friendſhip and alliance, buried the hatchet with the uſual ſolemnity.

In the Weſt-Indies, rear admiral Holmes, commander of the ſquadron at Jamaica, conducted his cruiſers with equal judgment and ſucceſs. Having received intelligence in the beginning of June, that ſeveral ſhips of war belonging to the enemy had ſailed from Port Louis, and in particular, that the St. Anne had juſt quitted Port au Prince, he forthwith made ſuch a diſpoſition of his ſquadron as was moſt likely to intercept them; and on the thirteenth day of the month he himſelf in the Hampſhire fell in with the St. Anne, and chaſed her to leeward down upon the Centaur. Her captain diſcovering this laſt ſhip, hauled up between them, ran cloſe in ſhore, until he was becalmed, about a league to the northward of Donna Maria bay. Then he began to fire his ſtern-chaſe; but when the Centaur came along-ſide, he ſtruck his colours, and ſurrendered. The St. Anne was a beautiful new ſhip, pierced for ſixty-four cannon, but mounting only forty, manned with near four hundred mariners and ſoldiers, under the command of Mr. Aiguillon, and loaded with a rich cargo of coffee, indigo, and ſugar. Nor was the ſquadron ſtationed off the Leeward Iſlands, under the conduct of Sir James Douglas, leſs alert and ſucceſsful in protecting the Britiſh traders, and clearing thoſe ſeas of the Martinico privateers, of which he took a great number.

In the month of June, the Iſland of Dominique, which the French had ſettled and fortified, was attacked and reduced by a ſmall body of troops commanded by lord Rollo, and conducted thither from Guadaloupe by Sir James Douglas, with four ſhips of the line, and ſome frigates. Two officers being ſent on ſhore at Roſeau, with a manifeſto addreſſed to the inhabitants, two deputies came off in order to treat of a ſurrender; but the firſt tranſports of their fear ſubſiding, and monſieur Longprie, their governor, encouraging them to ſtand upon their defence, they afterwards refuſed to ſubmit, and manned their intrenchments with a face of reſolution. The ſhips immediately anchored cloſe to the ſhore, and a diſpoſition was made for diſembarking. The troops landed in the evening, and formed on the beach-ſide, under the fire of the ſquadron. Lord Rollo, ſeeing the forces galled by an irregular fire from trees and buſhes; conſidering that the entrenchments commanded the town, which he had already occupied; that the country was naturally ſtrong, and the enemy might be reinforced before morning, determined wiſely to attack their entrenchments without delay; and this ſervice was performed by himſelf and colonel Melville at the head of the grenadiers, with ſuch vigour and ſucceſs, that the enemy were driven ſucceſſively from all their batteries and intrenchments: Mr. Longprie, their commandant, and ſome other officers, were taken at their head quarters. Next day the inhabitants ſubmitted, delivered up their arms, and took the oaths of allegiance to his Britannic majeſty. Thus the whole iſland was conquered at a very ſmall expence, and a defenſible poſt eſtabliſhed at Roſeau by the Britiſh commander.

Very little of conſequence happened in the Britiſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa, except the deſtruction of the town of Goree, which was accidentally ſet on fire; and an attempt on James fort, in the mouth of the river Gambia, by two French ſnows, one of which periſhed by running on ſhore, and the other ſailed away, after having ſuffered conſiderable damage.

With regard to the tranſactions in the Britiſh channel, a powerful ſquadron had been ſtationed all the winter in the bay of Quiberon, under the command of Sir Edward Hawke and Sir Charles Hardy. In the month of January, they took two ſmall French frigates bound to the coaſt of Guiney, and a few merchant-ſhips of little value; and in the month of March the two admirals returned to Spithead: but another ſquadron was afterwards ſent to occupy the ſame ſtation. In the month of July, while the Engliſh were employed in demoliſhing the fortifications on the iſle of Aix, the great ſhips that protected this ſervice were attacked by a French armament from the Charente, conſiſting of ſix prames †, a few row-gallies, and a great number of launches crowded with men. They dropped down with the ebb, and placing themſelves between the iſle d'Enet and fort Fouras, played upon the Engliſh ſhips in Aix road, with twelve mortars, and ſeventy large cannon; but they met with ſuch a warm reception from the Britiſh ſquadron, that in a few hours they retreated to their former ſtation, where the water was too ſhallow for the Engliſh ſhips to purſue them.

Theſe were part of that armament which had been formerly equipped for the reduction of Belleiſle, and which the Britiſh miniſtry were now determined, at all events, to ſubdue. Belleiſle lies four leagues from the point of Quiberon, about half way between Port Louis and the mouth of the Loire. It extends about ſix leagues in length, and little more than two in breadth; contains a pretty large town called Palais, fortified with a citadel, beſides a good number of villages, and the whole number of inhabitants, excluſive of the garriſon, may amount to ſix thouſand, chiefly maintained by the fiſhery of pilchards. It was ſuppoſed the reduction of this iſland would be eaſily atchieved, and the conqueſt attended with manifold advantages: that it would alarm the French nation, and oblige them to maintain a numerous body of forces on the oppoſite continent; conſequently make a conſiderable diverſion in favour of the Britiſh army in the north of Germany: that its central ſituation would render it an effectual check upon Port l'Orient, and diſable the enemy from equipping any naval armament at Breſt; as all the materials for building and fitting out ſhips in time of war, were brought thither from Port Louis, Nantz, and Rochfort, through the channel between Belleiſle and the main land, which conveyance, they could not pretend to uſe, if the Engliſh were maſters of Belleiſle: finally, that as all the French ſhips homeward bound from the Eaſt and Weſt Indies, as well as from other parts of the world, ran in with the land, ſo as firſt to make Belleiſle, the Engliſh, by keeping a ſmall ſquadron between the iſland and the main, and a good look-out in the offing, would be able to make prize of all thoſe veſſels.

The troops deſtined for this expedition, amounted to ten battalions under the command of major-general Hodgſon, aſſiſted by major-general Crauford, with proper engineers, ſome troops of light-horſe, and a detachment of artillery. The ſquadron, beſides tranſports, conſiſted of ten ſhips of the line, ſeveral frigates, two fire-ſhips, and two bomb-ketches, commanded by commodore Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle, a gallant officer, who had ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, in the courſe of this and the laſt war. The whole armament ſailed from Spithead on the twenty-ninth day of March; and on the ſeventh of April came to anchor in the great road of Belleiſle, where a diſpoſition was made for landing the forces. The commanders having agreed that the deſcent ſhould be made on the ſandy beach, near the point of Lomaria, towards the ſouth-eaſt end of the iſland, a feint was made to attack the citadel of Palais, while two large ſhips convoyed the troops to the landing-place, and ſilenced a battery which the enemy had there erected. This ſervice being performed, the flat-bottomed boats advanced to the ſhore, and a ſmall body of troops landed under the command of major Purcel and captain Osborn; but the enemy, who had intrenched themſelves on the heights, appeared ſuddenly above them, and poured down ſuch a ſevere fire, as threw them into confuſion, and intimidated the reſt of the troops from landing.

Captain Osborne, at the head of ſixty grenadiers, advanced with great intrepidity ſo near as to exchange ſeveral thruſts with the French officer, until having received three ſhots in the body, he fell dead on the ſpot. Major Purcel ſhared the ſame fate, which was extended to ſeveral other officers. In a word, this handful of men being over-powered with numbers, were totally routed, and either killed or taken priſoners; ſo that this attempt was attended with the loſs of near five hundred men, including two ſea-officers, and about fifty mariners belonging to the ſhips that endeavoured to cover the landing. This diſcouraging check was ſucceeded by tempeſtuous weather, which damaged ſome of the tranſports. When the ſtorm abated, the Prince of Orange ſhip of war ſailed round the iſland, in order to ſurvey the coaſt, and diſcover, if poſſible, ſome other place for diſembarkation; but the whole ſeemed to be ſecured by rocks and batteries in ſuch a manner, as precluded all acceſs.

Notwithſtanding this unfavourable proſpect, another ſcheme was laid, and the execution of it crowned with ſucceſs. On the twenty-ſecond day of the month, in the morning, the troops were diſpoſed in the flat-bottomed boats, and rowed to different parts of the iſland, as if they intended to land in different places; by which means the attention of the enemy was diſtracted in ſuch a manner, that they knew not where to expect the deſcent, and were obliged to divide their forces at random. Mean while brigadier Lambert pitched upon the rocky point of Lomaria, where captain Paterſon, at the head of Beauclerk's grenadiers, and captain Murray, with a detachment of marines, climbed the precipice with ſurpriſing intrepidity, and ſuſtained the fire of a ſtrong body of the enemy, until they were ſupported by the reſt of the Engliſh troops, who now landed in great numbers. Then the French abandoned their batteries, and retired with precipitation: but this advantage was not gained without bloodſhed. About forty men were killed, and a conſiderable number wounded, including colonel Mackenzie and captain Murray, of the marines, who ſeemed to vie with the marching regiments in valour and activity, and captain Paterſon of Beauclerk's grenadiers, who loſt his arm in the diſpute. Monſieur de St. Croix, the governor, perceiving that all the Engliſh troops were diſembarked, to the number of eight thouſand men, recalled all his detachments to Palais, and prepared for a vigorous defence, his forces, now joined by the militia of the iſland, amounting to four thouſand men fit for ſervice.

On the twenty-third of April, the Engliſh troops were formed into columns, and began their march towards the capital of the iſland. Next day general Hodgſon ordered a detachment of light horſe to take poſt at Sauzon; and on the twenty-fifth, a corps of infantry took poſſeſſion of a village called Bordilla, where they began to throw up an entrenchment; but they were diſlodged by a party of the enemy's grenadiers: the whole army, however, entrenched itſelf in the neighbourhood. The artillery and implements of ſiege for breaking ground, being ſtill on board the fleet, and the tempeſtuous weather rendering it impoſſible to ſend them aſhore, the French governor took this opportunity to erect ſix redoubts, to defend the avenues of Palais; and theſe were finiſhed with admirable ſkill and activity, before general Hodgſon had it in his power to begin his operations. All that he could do, in the mean time, was to publiſh a manifeſto, directed to the inhabitants, importing, that, if they would put themſelves under the protection of the Britiſh government, they ſhould be indulged with the free exerciſe of their religion, and retain all the rights and privileges, which they had ever enjoyed. This promiſe had a conſiderable influence upon the natives, a good number of whom immediately accepted the propoſal.

The next ſtep the general took was to ſummon the commandant, who continued encamped under the walls of the citadel, and declared he would defend the place to the laſt extremity; and indeed it muſt be owned, for the honour of this gentleman, that, in the courſe of the ſiege, he performed every thing that could be expected from a brave and experienced officer. About the latter end of April, ſome mortars being brought up, began to play upon the town, within the walls of which the enemy now took ſhelter; and at this time Sir William Peere Williams, a young gentleman of great merit and expectations, and captain in Burgoyne's light horſe, was ſhot by a French centinel, in reconnoitring their works.

The beſiegers broke ground on the ſecond of May; but next night the trenches were attacked by the enemy with ſuch vigour, that the piquets on the left were put in diſorder. Major-general Crawford, who commanded in the trenches, rallied the troops, and endeavoured to animate them by his own example; but on this occaſion they did not act with their uſual ſpirit; ſome hundreds were killed, and the major-general with his two aids du camp fell into the hands of the enemy, who retreated without having made any attempt upon the right, where the piquets ſtood their ground, determined to give them a warm reception. The damage they had done was next day repaired: a redoubt was begun near the right of their works; and from this period the operations of the ſiege were proſecuted with unremitting vigour, notwithſtanding a ſevere fire maintained without interruption, and a ſucceſſion of well-concerted ſallies, which were not executed without a conſiderable effuſion of blood.

The engineers giving it as their opinion that the works could not be properly advanced, until the French redoubts ſhould be taken, the general made the diſpoſition for the attack, which began on the thirteenth at day-break. A terrible fire from four pieces of cannon, and above thirty cohorns, was poured into the redoubt on the right of the enemy's flank: then a detachment of marines ſupported by part of Loudon's regiment, advanced to the parapet, drove the French from the works, and, after a very obſtinate diſpute with their bayonets fixed, took poſſeſſion of the place. All the other five were reduced, one after another, by by the ſame detachment, reinforced by Colvil's regiment, under the command of colonel Teeſdale and major Neſbitt; and a conſiderable ſlaughter was made of the enemy, who withdrew into the citadel in great confuſion. Such was the ardour of the aſſailants, that they entered the ſtreets of Palais pell-mell with the fugitives, made a good number of priſoners, and took poſſeſſion of the town, in which they found the French hoſpital, and ſome Engliſh priſoners, who had been taken in different ſallies.

The Engliſh being now maſters of the whole iſland, except the citadel of Palais, bent all their endeavours to the reduction of this fortreſs, which was very ſtrong both by art and nature, and defended with uncommon courage and perſeverance on the ſide of the beſiegers. Parallels were finiſhed, barricadoes made, and batteries erected; and an inceſſant fire from mortars and artillery was mutually maintained, by night and by day, from the thirteenth of May to the twenty fifth, when that of the enemy began to abate. In the courſe of ſuch deſperate ſervice, a great number of men muſt have been killed, and many died of diſtemper.

The iſland was in itſelf ſo barren, and monſieur de St. Croix had taken ſuch effectual precautions to remove its produce, that the Engliſh army had neither freſh proviſion nor refreſhments, except what was brought by ſea from England. From thence, indeed, they were tolerably well furniſhed with live cattle: they were alſo reinforced by one regiment from Portſmouth, and another from the iſland of Jerſey. By the end of May a breach was made in the citadel; and notwithſtanding the indefatigable induſtry of the garriſon and the governor, in repairing the damage, the fire of the beſiegers increaſed to ſuch a degree, that great part of their defences was ruined, and the breach became practicable by the ſeventh day of June, when monſ. de St. Croix, being apprehenſive of a general aſſault, demanded a capitulation. He was indulged with the moſt honourable conditions, in conſideration of the noble defence he had made. The articles were immediately ſigned and executed, and Beauclerk's grenadiers took poſſeſſion of the citadel.

Whatever might be the opinion of politicians concerning the value of this conqueſt, and the price at which it was purchaſed, certain it is, that the rejoicings in England were ſincere and univerſal. Great and deſerved applauſe was beſtowed upon the land and ſea officers employed in this expedition, who, with ſo noble a perſeverance, had encountered and overcome ſuch mighty difficulties, and who, after ſuch a ſevere check on their outſet, had the ſpirit to renew the attack under circumſtances nearly as unfavourable as thoſe by which they had at firſt been repulſed. The citizens of London addreſſed the king on the occaſion, and their example was followed by moſt of the towns and corporations in the kingdom.

While the war thus raged, with uncommon violence, in almoſt every quarter of the univerſe, a negotiation was ſet on foot for putting an end to the troubles, which had ſo long diſtracted the ſeveral nations of Europe. I have already obſerved, that the contending powers had agreed to open a general congreſs at Augsburg; and the Britiſh plenipotentiaries were actually nominated for this purpoſe; when the French king made propoſals of a ſeparate pacification with England, under the mediation of the Spaniſh monarch. Accordingly, after the mutual exchange of ſeveral letters and memorials between the two courts, miniſters were ſent from both kingdoms; Mr. Stanley on the part of England, and M. Buſſy on that of France. In order to ſmooth as much as poſſible, the way to peace, it was previouſly reſolved by both parties, to eſtabliſh ſome certain and ſimple points that might ſerve to direct and facilitate the whole negotiation. Theſe points were only two; and even theſe ſo inſeparately connected with each other, that they ſeemed rather members of the ſame propoſition than ſeparate articles. The firſt was, "that the two crowns ſhould remain in poſſeſſion of what they had conquered one from the other." The ſecond imported, that "the ſituation in which they ſhould ſtand at certain periods, ſhould be the poſition to ſerve as a baſis for the treaty which might be negotiated between the two powers."

As France was known to have had the worſt in the war, a propoſition of this kind coming from her muſt have appeared an inſtance of moderation, altogether ſurprizing to our miniſters. It is certain, that had peace been concluded at that inſtant, and upon the ſole foundation of this article, England would have poſſeſſed all the conqueſts ſhe had made, every one of which was in a very high degree advantageous to her commerce and her power, and none of which could be conſidered as a ſubject of future diſcuſſion. On the other hand, France by continuing in poſſeſſion of the places ſhe had conquered, would have acquired no advantage that could balance the expence of keeping them; while ſhe would, at the ſame time, be expoſed to endleſs altercations, and draw upon herſelf the jealouſy and indignation of her neareſt allies. This baſis certainly gave the Engliſh a vaſt ſuperiority in the negotiation; and it was natural to expect, that when they came to talk of reſtitutions, the evacuation of the French conqueſts in Germany would be purchaſed at a much ſmaller price, than their apparent magnitude might ſeem to demand. However, theſe were ſtill a matter of ſo much anxiety, and the nature of the preciſe ſtipulations ſo uncertain, that the negotiation, though it proceeded with ſtrong appearance of a deſire for peace, met with very frequent checks and delays. Both parties were indeed unanimous in the article of 'uti 'poſſidetis;' and it muſt be admitted, that there could not be a better ground to treat upon. But as the war ſtill continued, and whilſt it continued might daily make an alteration in the fortune of the contracting powers, it was neceſſary to fix upon ſome epochas to which this poſſeſſory article ſhould refer.

The French accordingly propoſed, that the ſituation in which they ſhould ſtand on the firſt of September, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-one, in the Eaſt-Indies; on the firſt of July in the Weſt-Indies and Africa; and on the firſt of May following in Europe, ſhould be the poſition or baſis to the treaty which might be negotiated between the two powers. They added, that as theſe epochas might ſeem too near or too diſtant for the intereſt of Great-Britain, they were extremely willing to enter into a negotiation upon that object.

The Engliſh miniſtry received this propoſition with leſs ſatisfaction than its apparent fairneſs deſerved. They entirely rejected the French epochas; and declared they could not admit, without prejudice to themſelves, any other epochas than thoſe which have reference to the day of ſigning the treaty of peace. Had this reſolution been ſtrictly adhered to, it was evident that the negotiation was that moment at an end: for though what was aſſerted in the French memorial in reply to this declaration, that the baſis of the propoſition of 'uti poſſidetis' was neceſſarily connected with the particular epochas propoſed, is by no means to be admitted; yet, on the other hand, it is eaſy to deny the validity of their ſubſequent aſſertion, "that "if not theſe, at leaſt ſome certain periods during "the war ought to be fixed; and that the uti poſ- "ſidetis could not reaſonably have reference only "to the time of ſigning the treaty of peace." For if the contrary principle were once admitted, it would be difficult to know, or even to gueſs with probability at the nature or the value of the poſſeſſions which by ſuch an article ſhould be mutually given away. And if thoſe difficulties occurred in the ſimplicity of a poſſeſſory article, they muſt be prodigiouſly increaſed upon every other, and at length come to ſuch a height as to preclude all poſſibility of negotiating on things of ſo intricate a nature as exchanges and equivalents. The French in their memorial inſiſted ſo ſtrongly on the propriety of eſtabliſhing theſe periods, that they threatened to recall the whole propoſition if they were refuſed.

Here it may not be amiſs to obſerve, that though the courts of London and Verſailles treated ſeparately, it was hitherto by no means propoſed, that this ſeparate diſcuſſion ſhould lead to a ſeparate peace. It was no more than a previous arrangement for the removal of thoſe difficulties, which might prevent the peace of France with England from being united with the general peace of Europe. But in proportion as the treaty advanced, it became obvious that the ſettling of any terms, which had no reference to the ſigning of ſomething obligatory between the two crowns, could at beſt be only void and illuſory, and might in the end even prove the ſource of dangerous and captious altercations. The Engliſh Miniſter therefore, before he could agree to treat definitively upon any point, and particularly upon the epochas, inſiſted upon two preliminary conditions.

Firſt, that every thing, which ſhould be happily adjuſted between the two crowns in relation to their particular war, ſhould be made obligatory, final and concluſive, independant of the ſtate of the negotiation at Augsburg.

Secondly, that the definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and France, or preliminary articles to that end, ſhould be ſigned and ratified between the date of that memorial and the firſt of the following Auguſt.

If theſe conditions were accepted, then England on her part conſented to name determinate epochas to which the uti poſſidetis ſhould refer; the firſt of July for Europe; the firſt of September for Africa and America; and the firſt of November for the Eaſt Indies. The French miniſtry, without conteſting the epochas themſelves, complained of the conditions; of the firſt, becauſe they ſaid it departed from the letter and ſpirit of the memorial of the twenty-ſixth of March, which was the foundation of the whole treaty; of the ſecond, on account of the extreme ſhortneſs of the time allotted for the diſcuſſion of ſuch difficult and momentous points; and the adjuſtment of matters which regarded a war extended over the four quarters of the globe; for the memorial which contained thoſe conditions was dated on the ſeventeenth, and was not received at Paris until the end of June, ſo that little more than a month was left to obtain the conſent of the court of Vienna to a ſeparate treaty, to ſettle the terms of that treaty, and, finally, to ratify every particular.

If a very good underſtanding had not ſubſiſted between her Imperial Majeſty and the king of France, it muſt have been very difficult to have received this conſent. But in fact it was immediately received, and upon one very ſhort and apparently reaſonable condition, "That nothing might be ſtipulated to the prejudice of the houſe of Auſtria." But when this condition came to be explained, as we ſhall ſee preſently, it was ſo far from facilitating, that it created new obſtacles to the peace. However, this acquieſcence of the principal of her allies enabled France to accept of the firſt condition without reſerve; and to the laſt ſhe alſo agreed verbally, though not in the cleareſt terms.

Every thing ſeemed for the preſent in the beſt ſituation, which in this ſtage of the treaty could be expected. The baſis of the negotiation was ſolidly eſtabliſhed. The article uti poſſidetis, after the taking Belleiſle, was a matter of leſs difficulty, and the epochas were in general ſettled in ſuch a manner, as to coincide with the deſigns and deſires of both parties. The treaty was confined to the two powers, and it was to be perfectly definitive with regard to them. A time for concluding it was alſo in a great meaſure ſettled; a circumſtance, which if it did not admit ſufficient leiſure for accurate diſcuſſion, cut off at leaſt the opportunities of chicane, and ſeemed to be the moſt ſuitable to a candid proceeding, and a ſincere deſire of peace.

The foundation being thus laid, the ſuperſtructure conſiſted in the adjuſtment of thoſe compenſations which were to be made for the reciprocal conqueſts, and here the whole difficulty of the two powers lay; a punctilio of honour might have intervened at the very firſt ſetting out, extremely pernicious to the ſalutary work in hand, from which party the firſt propoſition ſhould proceed: but in this reſpect France gave way, and that conceſſion afforded no inconſiderable proof of her pacific intentions.

The uti poſſidetis being ſettled as the baſis of the treaty, nothing could reaſonably be claimed by either party, that was not to be counterpoiſed by ſome equivalent from the other; and conſequently it was neceſſary to adjuſt and value their ſeveral poſſeſſions, pretenſions, and demands. There were ſix principal objects in this negotiation. Firſt, the limits of the two crowns in North America. Secondly, the conqueſts of Great-Britain in the Weſt-Indies, together with the neutral iſlands there. Thirdly, the Engliſh Conqueſts in Africa and in India. Fourthly, the adjuſtment of the particular affair between the Engliſh and French in Germany. Fifthly, the conduct which the two crowns were to obſerve with regard to their reſpective allies in Germany. And, laſtly, the Reſtitution of the captures made by England, previous to the declaration of war.

On the firſt of theſe articles, France propoſed to cede and guaranty all Canada to England; ſtipulating only that the free and public exerciſe of the Roman Catholic religion ſhould be permitted under the Engliſh government, and that thoſe of the old French coloniſts who choſe to retire might have leave to tranſport themſelves from thence, and take away or diſpoſe of their effects. In compenſation for this, they required a confirmation of the privilege of what fiſhing they enjoyed on the coaſt of Newfoundland, under the treaty of Utrecht; and, that this fiſhery might be carried on with advantage, they likewiſe required the reſtitution of the iſle of Cape Breton, excluding themſelves from erecting on that iſland any kind of fortification whatſoever.

The affairs in the Weſt Indies, which made the ſecond capital object, they purpoſed to ſettle in this manner: they offered to exchange Minorca for Guadaloupe and Marigalante; and as to the four neutral iſlands, they inſiſted that two of them, Dominica and St. Vincent, were held by their natural inhabitants the Caribbees, under the protection of France, and that they ought ſtill to remain in the ſame condition. With regard to the two others, they propoſed to make a fair diviſion; that St. Lucia ſhould remain to France, and that England ſhould enter into poſſeſſion of Tobago. On this head, it is ſufficient to obſerve, that in the opinion of ſome people, the Engliſh miniſtry did not, in this treaty, ſet the juſt value on the acquiſition they had made, when they looked upon Canada as the great and leading object, and only conſidered Guadalupe and Marigalante in a ſecondary and ſubordinate light. This is a queſtion of difficulty, and has been much agitated. Thoſe who dreaded a freſh American war, from the ambition of France, and were ſtruck with the idea of extended empire, preferred the former conqueſt; thoſe who ſolely conſidered the intereſt of England as a commercial people, were generally in favour of the latter.

On the ſide of Africa, France ſatisfied herſelf with demanding either the Settlement at Senegal, or the iſle of Goree; for which, together with the reſtoration of Belleiſle, they conſented to evacuate Gottingen, Heſſe, and Hanau, and to draw off their army to the Maine and the Rhine. This was certainly a full equivalent. But with regard to the Eaſt-Indies, they had no tolerable equivalent to offer. They expatiated much in their memorial upon the diſadvantages which would ariſe to the companies of the two nations, from their entertaining views of conqueſts, ſo contrary to the true ſpirit and real intereſt of thoſe trading eſtabliſhments; and they concluded, by propoſing the treaty formerly ſettled between the ſieurs Godcheau and Saunders as a baſis for the re-eſtabliſhment of peace in Aſia. It muſt be remarked, that this treaty had been concluded at a time when the affairs of France in the Eaſt-Indies made a very different figure than during this negotiation; and therefore it ſeemed unfair to make this treaty a ſtandard under circumſtances altogether inapplicable.

The war, which had been ſo long, with ſo much bloodſhed, and ſo fruitleſsly carried on in Weſtphalia, the French ſtrenuouſly contended was from the time of, what they called, the breach of capitulation of Cloſter-Seven, a war purely Engliſh; and therefore that their conqueſts in that part of Germany, formed a proper compenſation for the Engliſh conqueſts in the other quarters of the world. The Britiſh miniſters did not attempt formally to refute this aſſertion; they rather ſeemed to admit it, and agreed accordingly, to receive the evacuation of thoſe places as an equivalent for ceſſions to be made on the footing we have already mentioned. On this point there was little difficulty.

The intricate and knotty part was on what we have ſtated as the fifth object, the conduct of the two crowns with regard to their allies. There was a real, a capital difficulty. From the beginning of the negotiation, England had declared that ſhe would inviolably preſerve her faith to the king of Pruſſia, and would act ſtrenuouſly in his ſupport. This piqued the French miniſters, who, in their turn, thought themſelves bound to make a declaration equally ſtrong in favour of the empreſs; and they had, moreover, recently contracted with the court of Vienna, to admit nothing in the treaty to her diſadvantage. However, in this difficulty, they found out a ſolution, which, it muſt be confeſſed, had a very fair and captivating appearance. They propoſed that both armies in Germany ſhould obſerve an exact neutrality; and ſhould be reciprocally bound to afford no ſort of aſſiſtance, nor to give no ſort of offence, to the allies of either of the parties. And they propoſed further, that as armies in this ſtate of inert neutrality muſt be a dead and uſeleſs expence to the power who maintains them, the French king, from the time his Britannic majeſty recalled the Engliſh forces from Germany, would cauſe double the number of French forces from the armies of the Upper and Lower Rhine to return into France; and that no French troops ſhould remain in Germany, but in proportion to thoſe which the king of England ſhould keep in his pay. It might certainly be urged, in confirmation of the propriety of this offer, that in reality theſe armies, whilſt they continued in action, though they worried each other abundantly, offered no kind of aſſiſtance to their allies; and therefore when they came mutually to entertain pacific ſentiments concerning their own particular quarrel, and were to give an example of moderation to the reſt of Europe, there ſeemed to be no reaſon why they ſhould make efforts in favour of any ally which they had not made, or been able to make in the hotteſt time of hoſtility.

The laſt article had its difficulties alſo. The French inſiſted, as a point from which they were reſolved never to recede, upon the reſtitution of the captures made before the declaration of war. This demand, they were of opinion, was grounded on the cleareſt principles of the law of nations, and the moſt expreſs ſtipulation of treaties. Without entering into thoſe various arguments with which this poſition might be maintained and attacked, it appeared to many that the honour of both nations was almoſt equally concerned, the one to claim, the other as reſolutely to refuſe this reſtitution.

On the whole, theſe propoſals, which the French ſent to London in a memorial of the fifteenth of July, formed, though in ſome reſpects undoubtedly exceptionable, a very agreeable plan for a treaty of peace. A better could not have been expected in the firſt project of an enemy, and it might be hoped, that a negotiation thus favourably begun, could not fail of adjuſting eaſily whatever appeared wrong, or ſupplying whatever was defective in this firſt draught of the propoſitions. But fatally for the repoſe of mankind, in the very inſtant that this fair propoſal was made, at the very moment when theſe ſtrong demonſtrations were given, an act was done which blew up at one exploſion, the whole baſis of the treaty that had been long and carefully laying, ſcattered the materials which had been ſo induſtriouſly collected, and ſo cautiouſly arranged, and inſtead of extinguiſhing ſpread the flames of war much further, and made them rage with new fury. From this period all the whole tranſaction was carried on with animoſity, reſentment, and miſtruſt. Before and during this negotiation, the French miniſtry had uſed every art and intrigue in their power to intereſt the king of Spain in their quarrel, and infuſe a jealouſy into that monarch of the ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms. Hitherto, however, there was no apperance that th-ſe meaſures had any effect; but to the infinite ſurpriſe and indignation of the Britiſh miniſter, M. de Buſſy, the French agent, delivered with the paper which contained the above propoſitions, a private memorial, ſignifying, that in order to eſtabliſh the peace upon ſolid foundations, not to be ſhaken by the conteſted intereſts of a third power, the king of Spain might be invited to accede to guaranty the treaty; and that to prevent the differences which ſubſiſted between Great-Britain and this monarchy from being a means of producing a freſh war in Europe, with the conſent and communication of his Catholic majeſty, he propoſed, that in this negotiation, the three points which had been diſputed between the crowns of England and Spain, might be finally ſettled. Firſt, the reſtitution of ſome captures made upon the Spaniſh flag. Secondly, the privilege of the Spaniſh nation to fiſh on the banks of Newfoundland. Thirdly, the demolition of the Engliſh ſettlements made on the Spaniſh territories in the bay of Honduras.

It may be eaſily imagined, from the character of the ſecretary of ſtate, who then ſat at the helm of affairs, in what manner he received theſe propoſals: he rejected with the utmoſt contempt the offer of finiſhing a negotiation, through the mediation of an humbled enemy, relating to diſputes with a power actually in friendſhip with England. He called upon the Spaniſh miniſter to diſavow the propoſitions, which had been ſaid to be made with the knowledge of his court. He returned as wholly inadmiſſible this offenſive memorial, declaring, that it would be looked upon as an affront to the dignity of his maſter, and incompatible with the ſincerity of the negotiation, to make any further mention of ſuch a circumſtance.

He therefore immediately prepared an anſwer to the principal memorial, in a ſtile rather dictated by the circumſtances which accompanied that paper, and which ſufficiently indicated the deſigns of France, than what the propoſitions themſelves ſtrictly deſerved. He had indeed, by this time, conceived an incurable ſuſpicion of the ſincerity of France in the whole proceeding, and therefore it would not have been prudent to have made thoſe advances, which on a ſuppoſition of good faith, and pacific intentions, might poſſibly have been adviſeable: for though both powers had over and over declared, that their reſpective propoſitions, if the treaty ſhould by any accident be broken off, would be conſidered as retracted or never made; yet it is certain, that things once ſettled and agreed to, unavoidably ſtamp their own impreſſion upon any future negotiation, relative to the ſame ſubject.

Mr. Pitt's anſwer, which is dated on the twenty-ninth of July, agreed to the reſtitution of Guadaloupe, Marigalante, and Belleiſle, on the compenſations propoſed by France. It agreed alſo to receive Canada, but without any new limits or any exception whatſoever; and it added to the French the offer of all Canada, and its appurtenances. It admitted the propoſal of the partition of the neutral iſlands. It rejected the French demand of Cape Breton, or any other iſland in the gulph or river of St. Laurence, or of any power of fiſhing in that river, in that gulph, or on thoſe coaſts: but allowed the privilege of fiſhing on the banks of Newfoundland, on conſideration of the demolition of Dunkirk. But the propoſed reſtitution either of Senegal or Goree was utterly refuſed. The German neutrality was rejected with diſdain; and it was declared that Great Britain unalterably reſolved to ſupport the king of Pruſſia with efficacy and good faith. In addition to the offer made to evacuate Heſſe, &c. it was inſiſted that the French ſhould make a general evacuation of all her conqueſts in Weſtphalia, and all its countries, including her conqueſts from the king of Pruſſia on the Rhine, though France had before declared, that they were conquered for the queen of Hungary, that they were actually governed in her name, and that ſhe could not, conſiſtently with good faith, agree to deliver them to the king of Pruſſia. The treaty between Saunders and Godcheau was not admitted as a proper baſis for a treaty relative to the Eaſt-Indies. But it was agreed, that the two companies ſhould negotiate concerning their reſpective intereſts, as the king of Great Britain could not diſpoſe of the rights of the Engliſh Eaſt-India company without their conſent. As to the reſtitution of the captures made before the war, they were poſitively refuſed.

The confidence and good humour of the two courts being thus ſubverted, all that followed was rather an altercation than a treaty. It is true, that papers paſſed backward and forward; and the pretenſions of each party, the points they agreed to cede, and thoſe which they were determined to adhere to, grew more diſtinct and explicit. But all that cordiality was vaniſhed which is ſo neceſſary towards ſmoothing and clearing a road, which a long hoſtility had broken up, and ſo many intricate topics had contributed to embarraſs.

Without involving ourſelves in the detail of the ſeveral memorials which were delivered in, and without referring numerically to the ſeveral articles, it will be ſufficient that we briefly ſtate thoſe points which were, or ſeemed to be, in a fair way of adjuſtment between England and France; and afterwards wards thoſe on which it ſhould appear that the negotiation broke off.

After ſome diſcuſſions concerning its proper limits, it was agreed, that all Canada ſhould be ceded to the Engliſh. This ceſſion comprehended, on one ſide, all the iſlands and countries adjoining to the gulph of St. Laurence. On the other, it took in all the great lakes, and the whole courſe of the Ohio, to its diſcharge into the Miſſiſſippi; a territory ſufficient for the baſis of a great empire.

In drawing this line of diviſion, another queſtion aroſe concerning the bounds of Louiſiana, and the ſtate of the intermediate Indian nations between the lakes and the Miſſiſſippi, who inhabit, or are rather ſcattered over an immenſe country, that lies along the back of the Engliſh colonies all the way from Penſylvania to Georgia. It was therefore very proper that ſomething definitive ſhould be ſettled on this article, as it might otherwiſe eaſily be made productive of a new war. England propoſed that all thoſe nations ſhould continue, under the protection of Great Britain, without ſaying any thing preciſe, as to the dominion of the ſoil.

France controverted this propoſition; ſhe on her part propoſed to divide theſe nations; that thoſe to the northward of the line drawn to aſcertain the limits of Canada ſhould be independent, under the protection of England, but that thoſe, who were to the ſouthward, ſhould enjoy the ſame independence, under the protection of France. Nothing was perfectly ſettled in relation to this point; but it does not ſeem as if there could have been any material diſagreement upon it, had the other matters in debate been adjuſted to their mutual ſatisfaction.

The African conteſt ſeemed to have been attended with ſtill leſs difficulty. The French conſented to give up both Senegal and Goree, provided Anamaboo and Acra were guarantied to them.

The important queſtion of the fiſhery was likewiſe determined. The French gave up their claim to Cape-Breton and St. John's, and were ſatisfied to receive the little iſland of St. Pierre on the coaſt of Newfoundland; but even this they were to receive on conditions ſufficiently humiliating. They were to erect no ſort of fortification, nor to keep up any military eſtabliſhment there. An Engliſh commiſſary was to reſide on the iſland, in order to ſee that theſe ſtipulations were adhered to.

As to the reſt, the French were to have the ſame privileges on the coaſt of Newfoundland, checked with the ſame reſtrictions, which before they had enjoyed under the fifteenth article of the treaty of Utrecht. In conformity to another article of that treaty, and in compenſation for the privilege of the fiſhery, they conſented that Dunkirk ſhould be demoliſhed.

Concerning the iſlands of Guadaloupe, Marigalante, Minorca, and Belleiſle, no great controverſy had ſubſiſted from the beginning. It had all along been agreed, that theſe conqueſts ſhould be reciprocally reſtored. Neither did the French ſcruple to adopt the propoſal made by the Engliſh concerning the affairs of the Eaſt Indies, nor to make ſatisfactory declarations concerning Oſtend and Nieuport.

So many delicate and intereſting points were ſettled, that it does not at firſt appear what it was that could have retarded the peace. A diſcuſſion of the ſeparate intereſts of two powers only, that are in earneſt to agree, may be ſettled without any very conſiderable difficulty. The hard and almoſt inextricable part of the knot, is that wherein the oppoſite concerns, and intereſts of allies intervene. There were two points upon which, if we may form a judgment from appearances, this negotiation unfortunately broke off. The firſt was upon the manner in which England and France might be at liberty to aſſiſt their reſpective allies; and on the reſtitution of Weſel, Gueldres, and ſuch other places as the French had conquered from his Pruſſian majeſty.

With regard to the former, the repeated propoſals of France for a neutrality in Germany had been uniformly and poſitively rejected by the Britiſh adminiſtration. They conſidered therefore theſe offers as ſo many attacks upon national integrity. And this ſcheme not being admitted, they could come to no agreement, and ſcarcely to an intelligible explanation either of the mode, or the quantity of the aſſiſtance which they ſhould be at liberty mutually to ſend to their German allies, or of the place in which ſuch ſuccours ſhould be employed. As to Weſel and Gueldres, the French obſtinately refuſed to reſtore thoſe places. They declared that ſuch a ceſſion would be directly againſt the faith by which they were bound to the empreſs queen of Hungary, for whom they inſiſted that theſe places had been conquered, and in whoſe name alone they were governed, though they had been reduced by the French arms, and were at that moment held by French garriſons.

As to the ſecond point, namely, the reſtitution of the captures made previous to the declaration of war, the negotiating powers were equally poſitive, the one to demand, the other to refuſe it. The Engliſh argued, that this claim had no foundation in the law of nations, neither was it grounded on any particular convention. That the right of all hoſtile operations reſults, not from a formal declaration of war, but from the hoſtilities which the aggreſſor had firſt offered; that the contrary of this propoſition is at leaſt conteſtible; and ſince it can by no means be clearly eſtabliſhed, it follows, that the detainment of thoſe captures muſt be conſidered on the ſide of England, as part of the "uti poſſidetis," originally propoſed as the baſis of this treaty.

France, on the other hand, ſeemed as fully convinced of the juſtice of her pretenſions, and conſidered the arguments with which ſhe ſupported them to be ſo unanſwerable, that ſhe offered to ſubmit them to the juſtice of the Engliſh tribunals. They urged that this claim of reſtitution was founded on the law of nations, and upon particular conventions. by the nineteenth article of the peace of Utrecht, and by the ſecond article of the treaty of commerce; and that this was ſtrengthened by the third article of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, which renewed and confirmed thoſe articles in the preceding treaties.

By theſe articles a protection is allowed to the reſpective ſubjects which may have ſhips in the ports of either of the powers, becauſe having no opportunity of knowing that a rupture has happened, pened, they ſailed under the ſecurity of peace, and the faith of treaties. By a parity of reaſoning, the ſhips not actually in thoſe ports ought to enjoy the ſame ſecurity; elſe, as they are included in the ſame parity of circumſtances, it would follow, contrary to the principles of humanity and right reaſon, that the ſovereigns had provided for the preſervation of one part of their ſubjects from the miſeries of a ſudden rupture, to which they expoſe the reſt. The particular conventions of theſe treaties, they ſaid, had their foundation in general equity, and the law of nations; ſince, as it is impracticable for belligerant ſtates to agree amongſt themſelves which is the aggreſſor, it is proper that the ſubjects ſhould receive previous notice of the rupture, in order that they might be able diſtinctly to know when they are, or are not in ſecurity, or when they may, or may not rely upon the treaties which ſubſiſt between their ſovereigns.

Theſe topics were, as uſual, debated with great heat and little effect; and as in ſuch diſcuſſions the arguments on both ſides are plauſible, and there can be no authorized judge, the weight of the ſeveral pretenſions commonly depends upon the power of the parties to enforce them. On theſe two points, therefore, the renunciation of German alliances, and the reſtitution of captures, the negotiation from the beginning was at a ſtand: and on thoſe at length, to all appearance, it finally broke off.

We are, however, fully ſatisfied that the diſagreement even in thoſe points might have been only the pretended cauſe of the rupture. The true cauſe of the breach ſeems to have been the unſeaſonable interpoſition of the Spaniſh claims: for could France be ſuppoſed in good earneſt to deſire peace, that is, to deſire ſuch a reaſonable peace as her circumſtances might demand, when ſhe officiouſly mingled with a particular debate, the affairs of a foreign and neutral power, which had not the ſmalleſt connection with thoſe that were then properly under deliberation? It was ridiculous to urge, that this was done from a prudent foreſight, and to prevent a future war, which thoſe diſputes might poſſibly have occaſioned. The buſineſs was to put an end to the war which then actually ſubſiſted; and nothing could be farther from aſſiſting this deſign than to increaſe the ſubjects of debate. France muſt have been ſenſible of the weight of this argument, propoſed in the very beginning of this treaty, as a neceſſary precaution for carrying it on with effect, that their particular diſpute ſhould be ſeparated from thoſe of their German Allies, with which it certainly had a more natural connection than with thoſe that ſubſiſted between England and Spain; as all the former parties were then engaged directly or indirectly in the war, to which Spain had then no manner of relation.

The Engliſh miniſtry finding the French immoveable on the two capital points above-mentioned, and having no opinion of the ſincerity of their proceedings, ſent directions to Mr. Stanly to return to England, and to deſire that M. Buſſy ſhould, on the part of his court, receive the ſame orders: accordingly on the twentieth of September, an end was put to this negotiation; which being thus broken off, that propoſed at Augsburg never took place.

As nothing could have been more unprecedented, ſo nothing was more alarming than the proceeding of the court of Spain in the negotiation. It was altogether extraordinary to ſee a propoſal for accommodating diſputes that ſubſiſted between friends, coming through the channel of an enemy. It was extremely ſingular to ſee points of ſuch conſequence formally communicated and propoſed for deliberation by a French agent, commiſſioned only to negotiate a particular and diſtinct buſineſs, when the Spaniards had an ambaſſador reſiding in London, from whom no ſort of intimation had been previouſly received of ſuch a deſign.

That propoſal not only marked out a want of ſincerity on the part of France, but it manifeſted ſo ſtrange and irregular a partiality on the part of Spain, that it would very little have become the dignity of the king of Great Britain, or his attention to the ſafety of his ſubjects, to let it paſs without a full and ſatisfactory explanation. Accordingly the Spaniſh ambaſſador was called upon to diſavow this irregular procedure; but he returned a verbal, and ſoon after was authoriſed by his court to return a written anſwer, in which he openly avowed and juſtified the ſtep taken by the French agent, as entirely agreeable to the ſentiments of his maſter. He declared that the kings of France and Spain were united not only by the ties of blood, but by a mutual intereſt. He applauded the humanity and greatneſs of mind which his moſt Chriſtian majeſty demonſtrated in the propoſition that was complained of. He inſiſted much on the ſincere deſire of peace, the only motive which influenced the conduct of the two monarchs; and he added, haughtily, that if his maſter had been governed by any other principles, "his Catholic majeſty, "giving full ſcope to his greatneſs, would "have ſpoken for himſelf, and as became his dig-"nity."

It appeared evidently from the whole of this paper, that the court of Spain was regularly, as a ſort of party, appriſed of every ſtep that was taken in the negotiation; that her judgment was appealed to upon every point, and her authority called in aid to force the acceptance of the terms which were offered by France; in a word, that there was a perfect union of affections, intereſts, and councils between thoſe two courts; and the miniſter of the former, ſo far from denying or palliating this conduct, ſeemed to glory in it.

Mr. Pitt, who then took the lead in the miniſtry, was fully ſatisfied the intentions of Spain were by no means equivocal, and that this partiality, which they ſtrongly avowed, not only by declarations, but by facts, would drive them into all the meaſures of France. That a war on that account was abſolutely inevitable; and if, for the preſent moment, the Spaniards rather delayed their declaration of war, than laid aſide their hoſtile intentions, it was in order to ſtrike the blow at their own time, and with the greateſt effect; that therefore their reaſons for delaying to act were the very motives, which ought to induce us to act with the utmoſt ſpeed and vigour. That we ought to conſider the evaſions of that court as a refuſal of ſatisfaction, and that refuſal as a declaration of war. That we ought from prudence, as well as from ſpirit, to ſecure to ourſelves the firſt blow: and to be practically convinced, that the early and effective meaſures, which had ſo large a ſhare in reducing cing France to the dependance upon Spain, would alſo be the fitteſt for deterring or diſabling Spain from affording any protection to France. That, to carry on this war with vigour, it was only neceſſary to continue our preſent efforts; no new armament would be neceſſary; and that, if any war could provide its own reſources, it muſt be a war with Spain. That their flota had not yet arrived, and that the taking of it would at once diſable theirs and ſtrengthen our hands. This procedure ſo ſuited to the dignity of the nation, and the inſults it had received, would be a leſſon to Spain, and to every other power, how they ſhould preſume to dictate in our affairs, and to intermeddle with a menacing mediation, and an officiouſneſs as inſidious as it was audacious. That we would allow our enemies, whether ſecret or declared, no time to think and recollect themſelves.

Theſe ſentiments, ſo agreeable to the reſolute and enterpriſing character of this miniſter, appeared ſhocking to almoſt all the reſt of his collegues. They admitted that we ought not to be terrified from the aſſertion of our juſt demands, by the menaces of any power. They owned that Spain had taken a very extraordinary and very unjuſtifiable ſtep, but that we ought to admit, and even to wiſh for, an explanation. This court, upon a ſober, yet ſpirited remonſtrance, might recal that raſh propoſition into which they had been perhaps unwarily ſeduced by the artifices of France; that to ſhun war upon a juſt occaſion was cowardice, but to provoke or court it, was madneſs. And, if to court a war was not in general a very wiſe meaſure, to deſire it with Spain, if poſſibly it could be avoided, was to overturn the moſt fundamental principles of the policy of both nations. That this deſire of adding war to war, and enemy to enemy, whilſt we had our hands already as full as they could hold, and whilſt all our faculties were ſtrained to the utmoſt pitch, was to over-calculate the national ſtrength of our country, which, however great, had its limits, and was not able to contend with all the world: that whilſt we were calling for new enemies, no mention was made of new allies, nor indeed of any new reſource whatſoever, To plunge into ſuch meaſures, in the manner propoſed, and upon no better grounds, could not fail to ſcandalize and to alarm all Europe; and we could poſſibly derive no advantage from this precipitate conduct, which would not be more than counterbalanced by the jealouſy and terror it would neceſſarily create in every nation near us. As to the ſeizure of the flota, it was not to be depended upon, as at the very time of that deliberation, it might be expected to be ſafe in its harbour; and perhaps if we could ſucceed in ſeizing it, we might perform a ſervice not very agreeable to neutral nations, and as little advantageous to our own commerce.

If Spain, blind to her true intereſts, and miſled by French councils, ſhould give in a more deciſive manner into the deſigns of that court, and obſtinately refuſe a reaſonable ſatisfaction, it would be then true time to declare war, when all the neighbouring and impartial powers were convinced that we acted with as much temper as reſolution, and when every thinking man at home would be ſatisfied that we were not hurried into the hazards and expences of war, from an idea of chimerical heroiſm, but from inevitable neceſſity; and that in ſuch a caſe, we might depend upon the utmoſt ſupport which the nation could give to an adminiſtration that depended upon its ſtrength, and yet dreaded to waſte it wantonly, or to employ it unjuſtly. The miniſter, warmed by this oppoſition, declared that, "this was the time for humbling the whole houſe of Bourbon; that if this opportunity were let ſlip, it might never be recovered; and if he could not prevail in this inſtance, he was reſolved that this was the laſt time he ſhould ſit in that council. He thanked the miniſters of the late king for their ſupport; ſaid he was himſelf called to the miniſtry by the voice of the people, to whom he conſidered himſelf as accountable for his conduct; and that he would no longer remain in a ſituation which made him reſponſible for meaſures he was no longer allowed to guide."

On the diviſion, the miniſter himſelf, and a noble lord cloſely connected with him, were the only voices, in favour of the immediate declaration of war; the reſt of the board were unanimouſly againſt it.

Mr Pitt and lord Temple, adhering to their firſt opinion, and having declared their reaſons in writing, reſigned their employments. This reſignation ſeemed equal to a revolution in the ſtate. An univerſal alarm was ſpread; a thouſand rumours flew abroad, and the firſt ſuggeſtions were that this great miniſter, endeavouring to avail himſelf by his firmneſs in negotiation of the advantages he had acquired by his vigour in war, was oppoſed by the whole council, who were reſolved to have a peace at any rate, and that this oppoſition had driven him to reſign the ſeals. But the true cauſe of the reſignation very ſoon came out; and on this point a violent conflict enſued, in which the popular cauſe was worſt ſuſtained, and the miniſterial better, that is with greater effect, than is uſual in ſuch diſcuſſions. Some circumſtances contributed not a little to this ſucceſs.

When Mr. Pitt reſigned the ſeals, the great perſon to whom they were delivered, received them with eaſe and firmneſs, without requeſting that he ſhould reſume his office. His majeſty expreſſed his concern for the loſs of ſo able a ſervant; and to ſhew the favourable ſenſe he entertained of his ſervices, he made him a moſt gracious and unlimited offer of any rewards in the power of the crown to beſtow. His majeſty at the ſame time expreſſed himſelf not only ſatisfied with the opinion of the majority of his council, but declared he ſhould have found himſelf under the greateſt difficulty how to have acted, had that council concurred as fully in ſupporting the meaſure propoſed by Mr. Pitt, as they had done in rejecting it: a ſentiment (in the light in which his majeſty conſidered this meaſure) grounded upon the firmeſt principles of integrity and honour, and which muſt raiſe the higheſt veneration for his royal character, not only among his own ſubjects, but amongſt all nations, when they ſee a power which has ſo little to fear from any human effort, ſo very fearful of the leaſt infringement of the ſtricteſt and moſt critical rules of juſtice.

Mr. Pitt was ſenſibly touched with the grandeur and condeſcenſion of this proceeding. "I confeſs, Sire, ſaid he, I had but too much reaſon to expect your majeſty's diſpleaſure. I did not come prepared for this exceeding goodneſs. Pardon me, Sire, it overpowers, it oppreſſes me!" He then burſt into tears.

We are far from an attempt to add any colouring to ſo exquiſitely affecting a picture. We are indeed far from being able to do juſtice to perhaps one of the moſt pathetic and elevated ſcenes which could poſſibly be diſplayed, the parting of ſuch a prince and ſuch a miniſter.

The next day a penſion of three thouſand pounds a year was ſettled on Mr. Pitt for three lives, and at the ſame time a title was conferred upon his lady and her iſſue; a penſion the beſt beſtowed, and a nobility the moſt honourably acquired, and moſt truly merited. Immediately the gazette gave notice to the public of all theſe tranſactions. The reſignation made the firſt article, the honours and rewards the next; and they were followed by a letter from the Engliſh ambaſſador in Spain, containing an account of the favourable and pacific language of that court, and of the ſtrong aſſurance they gave of a deſire to accommodate all differences in an amicable manner.

Without preſuming to take any part in a controverſy which long divided the royal council, or without entering into the ſentiments of any faction, which we have always avoided, we may affirm with truth and impartiality, that no man was ever better fitted than Mr. Pitt, to be the miniſter in a great and powerful nation, or better qualified to carry that power and greatneſs to their utmoſt height. There was in all his deſigns a magnitude, and even a vaſtneſs, which was not eaſily comprehended by every mind, and which nothing but ſucceſs could have demonſtrated to be reaſonable. If he was ſometimes incorrect, he was never vulgar.

This power, as it was not acquired, ſo neither was it exerciſed in an ordinary manner. With very little parliamentary, and with leſs court influence, he ſwayed both at the council board and in parliament with an authority unknown before to the beſt ſupported miniſters. He was called to the miniſtry by the voice of the people; and what is more rare, he held it with that approbation; and under him for the firſt time, adminiſtration and popularity were ſeen united. Under him Great Britain carried on the moſt important war in which ſhe was ever engaged, alone and unaſſiſted, with greater ſplendor, and with more ſucceſs than ſhe had ever enjoyed at the head of the moſt powerful alliances. Alone this iſland ſeemed to balance the reſt of Europe.

In the conduct of the war he never ſuffered the enemy to breathe, but overwhelmed them with reiterated blows, and kept up the alarm in every quarter. If one of his expeditions was not ſo well calculated, or ſo ſucceſsfully executed, amends were made by another, and by a third. The ſpirit of the nation, once rouſed, was not ſuffered for a moment to ſubſide; and the French, dazzled as it were by the multitude and celerity of his enterprizes, ſeemed to have loſt all power of reſiſtance. In ſhort, he revived the military genius of the Engliſh; he ſupported our allies; he extended our trade; he raiſed our reputation; he augmented our dominions; and on his departure from the adminiſtration, left the nation in no other danger than that which ever muſt attend exorbitant power, and the temptation which induces the invidious exertion of it. Happy had it been for him, for his ſovereign, and his country, if a temper leſs auſtere, and a diſpoſition more compliant and conciliating, had been joined to his other great virtues. The want of thoſe qualities diſabled him from acting any otherwiſe than alone: it prevented our enjoying the joint fruit of the wiſdom of many able men, who might mutually have tempered, and mutually forwarded each other; and finally, which was not the leaſt loſs, it deprived us of his own immediate ſervices.

I now proceed to particularize the moſt remarkable events that happened in Great-Britain during the courſe of this year.

The new tax laidupon beer, excited loud clamours among the claſs of labouring people, eſpecially in the metropolis, where ſome few publicans began to raiſe the price, in conſequence of this impoſition: but, as they did not act in concert, thoſe houſes, in which the attempt was made, were immediately abandoned by their cuſtomers. Menacing letters and intimations were ſent to ſome individuals, ſuppoſed to have adviſed the new duty. The ſtreets reſounded with the noiſe of vulgar clamour and diſcontent; nor was it till after ſome time, and many experiments, that the price of ſtrong beer could be actually raiſed to the conſumer.

The eſtabliſhment of a militia, though at firſt projected in compliance with the earneſt requeſt of the people, was not, however, entirely accompliſhed, without exciting ſome dangerous commotions. As this kind of troops had already ſerved the term of three years, preſcribed by law, it was neceſſary to ballot for a ſucceſſion of men; and in the month of March the juſtices of the peace in the county of Northumberland were aſſembled at Hexham for this purpoſe. The common people being determined to oppoſe this regulation, which they conſidered as an intolerable grievance, aſſembled to the number of five thouſand of both ſexes, and of all ages, ſome of them armed with clubs, and ſome of them with fire-arms. The juſtices, apprehenſive of ſome ſuch diſorder, had procured a battalion of the Yorkſhire militia for their guard, and theſe were drawn up in the market-place. The populace being joined by a body of deſperate keelmen from Newcaſtle, began to inſult the guard with reproaches, miſſiles, and even with blows, which the militia for ſome time bore with all the patience that could be imagined. The riot act was read, and the people were exhorted to retire to their reſpective habitations. But inſtead of complying with this advice, they became more untractable. Encouraged by the forbearance of the militia, and poſſeſſed with a notion that they would not commit hoſtilities, they proceeded from one act of outrage to another; aſſaulted them as they ſtood arranged in order of battle, and killed an officer and two private men. Thus exaſperated, the militia poured in upon them a regular diſcharge, by which forty-five were killed on the ſpot, and three hundred miſerably wounded. The ſurvivors immediately betook themſelves to flight, and many dropped down upon the road in their retreat. The moſt lamentable part of this diſaſter was a circumſtance which attends all ſuch unfortunate occaſions: ſome hapleſs women and children, drawn thither by curioſity, or the more laudable motive motive of perſuading their huſbands, parents, or kinſmen to retire, were confounded and periſhed in the undiſtinguiſhing vengeance of the day. Some of the rioters, being apprehended, were tried for high treaſon, convicted, condemned, and executed for examples.

The ſpirit of murder and aſſaſſination ſtill continued to prevail in different parts of the kingdom. Women attempted the lives of their huſbands, and huſbands embrued their hands in the blood of their wives. As the laſt year was diſtinguiſhed by an atrocious murder committed in London by a foreigner, ſo the preſent exhibited an inſtance of the ſame kind, perpetrated by another ſtranger in the capital, though attended with much more ſavage and horrible circumſtances. One Theodore Gardelle, a Swiſs painter, being provoked by ſome trivial injury, layed violent hands on Mrs. King, in whoſe houſe he lodged, near Leiceſter Square, and deprived her of life in her own apartment. The rage of paſſion, which prompted him to this exceſs, was ſucceeded by a tranſport of terror, which hurried him into ſuch meaſures for his own preſervation, as cannot fail to ſhock the humane and tender reader. He concealed what had paſſed by locking the apartment where the body lay, and by diſmiſſing the maid ſervant, who happened to be abſent when the murder was committed. He had ſent her upon ſome errand to a different part of the town, as if the murder had been a premeditated ſcheme: when ſhe returned, he told her Mrs. King was gone ſuddenly to the country, and had directed him to diſmiſs her from her ſervice. He accordingly payed her the wages that were due to her, in conſequence of which ſhe retired.

Being now in poſſeſſion of the houſe, he paſſed the night alone in his own apartment. Next morning he deſcended to the chamber where the body of the unhappy woman lay, ſeparated the head, and even diſſected it with the moſt gloomy deliberation. This he conſumed by fire: the bowels he took out, and buried in the ſoil of the privy. He then diſmembered the body, and deſtroyed the limbs with a fire made of green wood, that the ſmell of fleſh might not alarm the neighbours. He divided the trunk in ſmall pieces, and carrying part of them in a ſack, threw them into the river. This was a work of time, which he ſeemed to brood over with a kind of horrid enjoyment. In the intervals of his labour, he ſolaced himſelf with the converſation of a proſtitute, who lay with him in the houſe, and from whoſe ſide he roſe early in the morning in order to finiſh his dreadful taſk.

His guilt could not be long concealed. The ſudden diſappearance of Mrs. King, and the diſtracted behaviour of the aſſaſſin, created ſuſpicion. He found it neceſſary to employ an occaſional domeſtic, who perceived ſigns of blood. The ſervant, whom he had diſmiſſed, exerted herſelf in his detection: a warrant was granted for apprehending Gardelle; and ſearch being made in the houſe, parcels of the body were found. The murderer, being brought to trial, was convicted on the fulleſt evidence, and executed in the open ſtreet, not far from the place where the crime was committed.

I ſhall conclude this narrative of domeſtic tranſactions with an account of the marriage and coronation of their preſent majeſties.

The king, ever attentive to the great purpoſes of his elevation, and deſirous of giving all poſſible permanency to the preſent happy eſtabliſhment, reſolved to chooſe a conſort, whoſe participation might ſweeten the cares of government, and whoſe virtues ſhould make his private happineſs coincide with the ſatisfaction of his people. Struck with the character of the princeſs Charlotta-Sophia, princeſs of Mecklenburg-Strelitz *, he privately employed perſons, in whom he could confide, to aſcertain the report of her engaging qualifications; and being fully convinced of her perſonal attractions, her amiable diſpoſition, and ſuperior underſtanding, he made a formal demand of her in marriage. The propoſal of ſuch an illuſtrious alliance could not but be acceptable to the court of Mecklenburg; and the princeſs herſelf was not inſenſible to the extraordinary accompliſhments of the young monarch, who had thus diſtinguiſhed her by his affection and eſteem.

On the eighth of July, the members of the privy council being aſſembled to a very conſiderable number, the king acquainted them in a formal ſpeech, that, "having nothing ſo much at heart as to procure the welfare and happineſs of his people, and to render the ſame ſtable and permanent to poſterity, he had, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne, turned his thoughts towards the choice of a princeſs for his conſort; and now, with great ſatisfaction, acquainted them, that, after the fulleſt information, and mature deliberation, he had come to a reſolution to demand in marriage the princeſs Charlotta of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; a princeſs diſtinguiſhed by every eminent virtue, and amiable endowment; whoſe illuſtrious line had conſtantly ſhewn the firmeſt zeal for the Proteſtant religion, and a particular attachment to his family: that he had judged it proper to communicate to them theſe his intentions, that they might be fully apprized of a matter ſo highly important to him and to his kingdoms, and which he perſuaded himſelf would be moſt acceptable to all his loving ſubjects."

This declaration was ſo agreeable to the council, that they unanimouſly requeſted it might be made public for the ſatisfaction of the nation in general. The earl of Harcourt was appointed ambaſſador-plenipotentiary to the court of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, to demand the princeſs, and ſign the contract of marriage; and the royal yachts were prepared, under convoy of a gallant ſquadron commanded by lord Anſon, to convoy the future queen to England. Meanwhile her houſhold being eſtabliſhed, the ambaſſador ſet out for the continent on this important affair. The dutcheſſes of Ancaſter and Hamilton and the counteſs of Effingham were appointed ladies of the bed-chamber, to attend her from the court of Mecklenburg in her paſſage to England; and embarking at Harwich, the whole fleet ſet ſail for Stade on the eighth day of Auguſt. The contract of marriage being ſigned by the earl of Harcourt at Strelitz, her royal highneſs was complimented by the ſtates of the country, and the deputies of the towns. The ambaſſador and the ladies were magnificently entertained; and the event was celebrated with the moſt ſplendid rejoicings.

* The dutchy of Mecklenburg lies between Lunenburg and the Baltick, and is neither rich nor extenſive. The dukes are ſaid to be deſcended from the kings of the Vandals. The people were converted to the Chriſtian religion in the twelfth century, and at preſent profeſs the Lutheran perſuaſion. The duke of Mecklenburg-Swerin, being the eldeſt branch, poſſeſſes a yearly revenue amounting to about forty thouſand pounds. The duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz does not receive above twenty thouſand pounds a-year; but he has a voice in the diet of the empire. The princeſs Charlotta-Sophia, who was then in the ſeventeenth year of her age, is ſiſter to the laſt mentioned prince, born of Elizabeth, daughter of Erneſt-Frederick, duke of Saxe Hildburghauſen.

On the ſeventeenth day of the month, the princeſs, accompanied by the reigning duke her brother, ſet out for Mirow, amidſt the tears and prayers of all ranks of people, the poor in particular, whoſe zealous patroneſs ſhe had always ſhewn herſelf. Next day ſhe arrived at Perleberg, where the count de Gotter complimented her in the name of the Pruſſian monarch. From thence ſhe continued her journey by Leutzen to Gourde, and on the twenty-ſecond reached Stade, under a general diſcharge of cannon, and amidſt the acclamations of the people. She was received by all the burgeſſes in arms: the whole town was illuminated: triumphal arches were erected; ſeveral of the principal ladies preſented her with verſes on her approaching nuptials; and the public joy was expreſſed by every poſſible demonſtration. On the twenty-third ſhe embarked in the yacht at Cuxhaven, where ſhe was ſaluted by the Britiſh ſquadron aſſembled for her convoy. The moment ſhe entered the cabin, ſhe ſaluted the officers of the different ſhips, who had crouded the deck in order to have the pleaſure of ſeeing her, and were all charmed with her polite and eaſy behaviour.

In this interval the minds of the Engliſh people were wound up to the higheſt pitch of expectation. The king having ſignified his intention that the princeſs ſhould land at Greenwich, both ſides of the Thames were for ſeveral days lined with innumerable multitudes. The river itſelf was covered with pleaſure-boats, wherries, and other veſſels filled with ſpectators, and cruiſing between Blackwall and Graveſend, in order to meet and welcome their future queen's arrival. Seats and ſcaffolds were prepared along the ſhore for ſeveral miles; and all the publicans reſiding near the banks of the river, both in Kent and Eſſex, were enriched by an amazing conflux of company. Every individual obſerved the wind as earneſtly as if his whole fortune had depended upon the firſt change of weather; and London poured forth her ſwarms like an immenſe hive during the firſt gleams of vernal ſunſhine. All the medicinal wells, to which wealthy people reſort in the ſummer, either for health or pleaſure, were now deſerted; and numbers flocked to the metropolis from all parts of the united kingdom to ſee their ſovereign's bride, and be eye-witneſſes of the enſuing coronation. After a tedious voyage of ten days, during which the fleet was expoſed to three different ſtorms, and often in danger of being driven on the coaſt of Norway, the princeſs landed on the ſeventh day of September in the afternoon at Harwich, where ſhe was received by the mayor and aldermen in their formalities. She advanced with her attendants by the way of Colcheſter to Witham, and lodged at a houſe belonging to the earl of Abercorn, where ſhe gratified the curioſity of the people with the moſt obliging condeſcenſion. Meanwhile the king, whoſe ardour far ſurpaſſed the impatience of his ſubjects, being apprized by couriers of her arrival, diſpatched his own coaches, with a party of the horſe-guards, who met her at Rumford, and conducted her to London, through innumerable crouds of people, aſſembled on the road to gratify their curioſity and welcome her arrival. Their applauſe was ſignified in tumultuous acclamations, which attended her for ſeveral miles; and the eagerneſs of the populace was even carried to a degree of licentious zeal, which the guards could hardly reſtrain within the bounds of decent reſpect.

Thus accompanied by great numbers in carriages, on horſeback and a-foot, this amiable princeſs proceeded by Shoreditch church, up Old-ſtreet to the city-road, acroſs Iſlington, along the new road into Hyde-park, and down Conſtitution-hill, to the garden gate of the palace of St. James's, where ſhe was handed out of her coach by the duke of Devonſhire, in quality of lord-chamberlain. At the gate ſhe was received by the duke of York, and in the garden ſhe was met by the king himſelf, whoſe looks declared the tranſports of his joy. When ſhe made her obeiſance, he raiſed her by the hand, which he kiſſed, and then led her up ſtairs to the palace, where they dined together, with the whole royal family. At nine the nuptial ceremony was performed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury in the royal chapel, which had been magnificently decorated for the occaſion. Beſides the royal family, all the great officers of ſtate, the nobility, peers and peereſſes, and the foreign miniſters, attended at the ſervice, the concluſion of which was announced to the people by the diſcharge of the artillery at the Park and the Tower; and the cities of London and Weſtminſter were illuminated in honour of this auſpicious event. Nothing was now ſeen at court but ſplendor and feſtivity, exhibiting all the marks of mirth and ſatisfaction. The great acceſſion of domeſtic happineſs that the king enjoyed in this connection, enabled him to ſupport the fatigue of receiving freſh addreſſes of felicitation, which were uſhered in as uſual by the city of London, and preſented to him by the clergy, the univerſities, the diſſenters, the cities, towns, and corporations in all parts of the Britiſh dominions.

The ceremony of the nuptials was ſoon ſucceeded by that of the coronation, which could not fail of being extremely irkſome and diſagreeable to a prince of true taſte and ſentiment. A commiſſion had long ago paſſed the ſeal, conſtituting a court to decide the pretenſions of a great number of people, who laid claim to ſeveral offices and privileges, in the celebration of this neceſſary form; and many of theſe, being derived from the moſt remote antiquity, carried with them an uncouth and ridiculous appearance to a modern reader. Weſtminſter-hall was prepared for the coronation-banquet, by removing the courts of judicature, boarding the floor, erecting canopies, and building three rows of galleries for the accommodation of ſpectators. A platform was laid between this Hall and the Abbey-church, where the king is actually crowned. All the houſes and ſtreets within ſight of the proceſſion were faced and crowded with benches and ſcaffolding, which extended on both ſides within the Abbey from the Weſtern entrance almoſt up to the choir. The proſpect formed by theſe occaſional erections, which were ſurpriſingly calculated for ſecurity and convenience, could not fail to awaken the expectation of the ſpectator for ſomething ſolemn and ſublime: but when all theſe benches were filled with above two hundred thouſand people, of both ſexes, arrayed in gay apparel, they filled the mind with an aſtoniſhing idea of the wealth and populoſity of Great Britain, and entirely eclipſed the proceſſion, notwithſtanding the incredible profuſion of jewels and finery, and all the other circumſtances of pomp by which it was diſtinguiſhed. The principal objects, however, ſtill maintained their importance in the eyes and boſoms of all the ſpectators, who could not without the moſt lively emotions of admiration and joy behold ſuch attractive accompliſhments in the royal pair, whoſe virtues adorned the crowns they were deſtined to wear.

The oſtentation of this year was cloſed with the anniverſary pageants that celebrate the election of a new lord mayor in the city of London. As the kings and queens of Great-Britain are always entertained at Guildhall by the magiſtrate who happens to be choſen in the year of the coronation, extraordinary preparations were made for the reception of their majeſties; who, with a great number of the nobility, honoured the banquet, in the midſt of the moſt tumultuous expreſſions of loyalty and attachment that ever were known on any former occaſion.

On the third of November the new parliament was opened at Weſtminſter; and, as no miniſterial influence had been uſed in electing the members of which it was compoſed, it undoubtedly deſerved the appellation of a free parliament; a phænomenon which had not appeared in the meridian of Great Britain for the ſpace of above forty years before this period. The king, being ſeated on the throne, commanded the attendance of the commons; to whom he ſignified his pleaſure, by the mouth of the high-lord-chancellor, that they ſhould return to their houſe, and chuſe a new ſpeaker. Accordingly their unanimous choice fell upon Sir John Cuſt, baronet, a gentleman of extenſive knowledge and diſtinguiſhed probity, qualified in all reſpects to ſupply the room of Mr. Onſlow, who had ſo long and ſo worthily diſcharged that important office. His majeſty, repairing again to the houſe of peers on the ſixth, approved of the ſpeaker, and harangued the parliament in theſe words.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"At the opening of the firſt parliament, ſummoned and elected under my authority, I with pleaſure take notice of an event, which has made me completely happy, and given univerſal joy to my loving ſubjects. My marriage with a princeſs, eminently diſtinguiſhed by every virtue, and amiable endowment, whilſt it affords me all poſſible domeſtic comfort, cannot but highly contribute to the happineſs of my kingdoms; which has been, and always ſhall be, my firſt object in every action of my life.

"It has been my earneſt wiſh that this firſt period of my reign might be marked with another felicity; the reſtoring of the bleſſings of peace to my people, and putting an end to the calamities of war, under which ſo great a part of Europe ſuffers. But though overtures were made to me, and my good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia, by the ſeveral belligerant powers, in order to a general pacification, for which purpoſe a congreſs was appointed; and propoſitions were made to me by France, for a particular peace with that crown, which were followed by an actual negotiation; yet that congreſs hath not hitherto taken place, and the negotiation with France is entirely broken off.

"The ſincerity of my diſpoſition to effectuate this good work has been manifeſted in the progreſs of it; and I have the conſolation to reflect, that the continuance of the war, and the farther effuſion of Chriſtian blood, to which it was the deſire of my heart to put a ſtop, cannot with juſtice be imputed to me.

"Our military operations have been in no degree ſuſpended or delayed; and it has pleaſed God to grant us farther important ſucceſſes, by the conqueſts of the iſlands of Belleiſle and Dominique; and by the reduction of Pondicherry, which hath in a manner annihilated the French power in the Eaſt Indies. In other parts, where the enemy's numbers were greatly ſuperior, their principal deſigns and projects have been generally diſappointed, by a conduct which does the higheſt honour to the diſtinguiſhed capacity of my general prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, and by the valour of my troops. The magnanimity and ability of the king of Pruſſia have eminently appeared in reſiſting ſuch numerous armies, and ſurmounting ſo great difficulties.

"In this ſituation, I am glad to have an opportunity of receiving the trueſt information of the ſenſe of my people, by a new choice of their repreſentatives. I am fully perſuaded you will agree with me in opinion, that the ſteady exertion of our moſt vigorous efforts, in every part where the enemy may ſtill be attacked with advantage, is the only means that can be productive of ſuch a peace, as may with reaſon be expected from our ſucceſſes. It is, therefore, my fixed reſolution, with your concurrence and ſupport, to carry on the war, in the moſt effectual manner, for the intereſt and advantage of my kingdoms; and to maintain, to the utmoſt of my power, the good faith and honour of my crown, by adhering firmly to the engagements entered into with my allies. In this I will perſevere, until my enemies, moved by their own loſſes and diſtreſſes, and touched with the miſeries of ſo many nations, ſhall yield to the equitable conditions of an honourable peace; in which caſe, as well as in the proſecution of the war, I do aſſure you, no conſideration whatever ſhall make me depart from the true intereſts of theſe my kingdoms, and the honour and dignity of my crown."

"Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

"I am heartily ſorry, that the neceſſity of large ſupplies appears ſo clearly from what has already been mentioned. The proper eſtimates for the ſervices of the enſuing year ſhall be laid before you; and I deſire you to grant me ſuch ſupplies, as may enable me to proſecute the war with vigour, and as your own welfare and ſecurity, in the preſent critical juncture, require, that we may happily put the laſt hand to this great work. Whatſoever you give ſhall be duly and faithfully applied.

"I dare ſay your affectionate regard for me and the queen makes you go before me in what I am next to mention; the making an adequate and honourable proviſion for her ſupport, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſhould ſurvive me. This is what not only her royal dignity, but her own merit calls for, and I earneſtly recommend it to your conſideration.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have ſuch confidence in the zeal and good affect ons of this parliament, that I think it quite ſuperfluous to uſe any exhortations to excite you to a right conduct. I will only add, that there never was a ſituation in which unanimity, firmneſs, and diſpatch, were more neceſſary for the ſafety, honour, and true intereſt of Great Britain."

Theſe expreſſions of confidence and eſteem, which flowed from the heart of a patriot king, met with the moſt cordial returns of gratitude and affection. The two houſes unanimouſly reſolved to addreſs their ſovereign in the warmeſt terms of zeal and attachment. The commons, having thanked him for this moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne, preſented their congratulations on the joyful and auſpicious event of his nuptials, with a princeſs deſcended from an illuſtrious proteſtant line, diſtinguiſhed by the moſt eminent graces and endowments, worthy to be the partner of a throne, by poſſeſſing every virtue by which it could be adorned. They expreſſed their deep ſenſe of the affectionate regard he had manifeſted for his people, by conſulting, on this important and intereſting occaſion, as on every other, the happineſs of them and their poſterity. They aſſured him, that with hearts full of gratitude for this ſignal inſtance of his royal attention to the welfare of his ſubjects, and thoroughly ſenſible of the exalted merit of his illuſtrious conſort, his faithful commons would not fail to make ſuch honourable and ample pro viſion as might enable her to ſupport her royal dignity with proper luſtre, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty *; for the long continuance of whoſe life they ſhould offer up their moſt ardent vows to Providence, without ceaſing. They thanked his majeſty for having expreſſed his concern for the proſperity of his people, in wiſhing to reſtore them the bleſſings of peace. They declared their admiration of that humanity ſo becoming the royal breaſt, which, amidſt the ſucceſſes of his own kingdoms, felt for the calamities of other nations. They profeſſed themſelves fully perſuaded, that thoſe beneficent diſpoſitions which induced his majeſty to propoſe a congreſs for a general pacification, and to engage in a negotiation with France for a particular peace, could not have failed of the deſired effect, if the enemy, influenced by the ſame motives, had ſhewn the ſame good intentions, and would have complied with ſuch conditions as were requiſite for the accompliſhment of that ſalutary work. They teſtified the moſt grateful acknowledgment of his majeſty's vigilance and firmneſs, in not ſuffering the hopes and expectations of peace to produce the leaſt ſuſpence or relaxation in the exertion of his arms; and congratulated his majeſty on thoſe happy ſucceſſes, which, under the good providence of God, they aſcribed to the wiſdom and vigour of his majeſty's meaſures: to theſe they owed the reduction of Dominique, the conqueſt of Belleiſle, atchieved with ſo much reputation to the Britiſh arms, and the deſtruction of the enemy's power in the Eaſt Indies, by the acquiſition of Pondicherry, their laſt remaining ſettlement of any ſtrength in thoſe countries. They obſerved, that the wiſe and able conduct of his ſerene highneſs prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, whereby he had ſucceſſively defeated the projects of the enemy, and prevented their making that progreſs, which, from their ſuperior numbers, they expected; together with that gracious approbation which his majeſty had been pleaſed to expreſs of the valour of his troops; could not but give the higheſt ſatisfaction to his faithful commons. They ſaid, they ſaw with juſt admiration repeated proofs, in every campaign, of that unſhaken reſolution, and of thoſe aſtoniſhing efforts, which alone could have enabled his majeſty's great ally, the king of Pruſſia, to reſiſt the numerous forces of his enemies. They aſſured him, he might depend upon their intire concurrence and ſupport, in the moſt effectual proſecution of the war, for the intereſt and advantage of Great Britain; and in maintaining, to the utmoſt of their power, the good faith and honour of his majeſty's crown, and the engagements entered into with his allies: and they declared themſelves truly ſenſible, that the conſtant care and attention of his majeſty to purſue the moſt vigorous meaſures, in every part, where any ſucceſsful impreſſion could ſtill be made upon the enemy, were the only means to attain that deſirable object, an honourable and laſting peace. They acknowledged with the deepeſt gratitude, that moſt endearing expreſſion of his majeſty's unbounded goodneſs and affection towards his native country, in the ſolemn declaration which he had been pleaſed to make, that, as well in the proſecution of the war as in the concluſion of the peace, no conſideration whatever ſhould induce him to depart from the true intereſts of his kingdoms, and from the honour and dignity of his crown. They gave him to underſtand, that his faithful commons would chearfully grant ſuch ſupplies as the nature and extent of the ſeveral ſervices ſhould be found to require, firmly relying on his majeſty's wiſdom and juſtice, that they would be applied with the ſtricteſt œconomy, and in ſuch a manner as might moſt effectually anſwer the great ends for which they ſhould be granted. They expreſſed their earneſt deſires, that this firſt parliament convened by his authority, might, by their conduct, give his majeſty a happy proof of the zeal, the loyalty, and the affection of his people. They concluded with ſaying, that, ſenſible of the difficult criſis in which they were aſſembled, they were determined to concur, with the greateſt firmneſs and unanimity, in whatever might contribute to the public welfare, might tend to defeat the views and expectations of their enemies, and convince the world, that there were no difficulties which his majeſty's wiſdom and perſeverance, with the aſſiſtance of his parliament, could not ſurmount.

The ſupplies of the year, which amounted to eighteen millions, two hundred twenty nine thouſand, one hundred thirty-five pounds, eighteen ſhillings and eleven-pence halfpenny, were juſt provided,

* They afterwards reſolved, that in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty, ſhe ſhould enjoy a proviſion of one hundred thouſand pounds per annum during her life, together with the palace of Somerſet-houſe, and the lodge and lands at Richmond old Park.

vided, when the public attention was called off to an incident of national importance. The king of Great Britain had directed the earl of Briſtol, his ambaſſador at Madrid, to demand of the Spaniſh miniſtry an explanation of the late treaty concluded between the kings of France and Spain; and particularly to require a categorical declaration with reſpect to the part his catholic majeſty intended to act in the diſputes between the courts of London and Verſailles. His inſtructions imported, that thoſe queſtions ſhould be put with all the delicacy which the nature of ſuch demands could admit, that Spain ſhould have no cauſe to complain that ſhe was treated with want of decorum. The demands were made accordingly, with all imaginable demonſtrations of reſpect; but as the anſwers given appeared evaſive and unſatisfactory, he became more peremptory in his remonſtrances; and at length plainly declared, that if the court of Spain ſhould refuſe a poſitive explanation whether the catholic king intended to ally himſelf with France againſt England, he ſhould interpret the refuſal into an aggreſſion and declaration of war, and, in conſequence, be obliged to retire from the court of Madrid. The Spaniſh monarch had already taken his meaſures in concert with the court of Verſailles, and waited only for an opportunity to provoke Great-Britain into an immediate rupture. In anſwer therefore to this declaration, Mr. Wall, the Spaniſh Miniſter, replied, that ſuch a ſtep could only be ſuggeſted by the ſpirit of haughtineſs and of diſcord, which, for the misfortune of mankind, ſtill reigned but too much in the Britiſh government; that it was in that very moment the war was declared, and the king's dignity violently attacked; and the earl might retire how and when he ſhould think proper. Nothing could be more idle and frivolous than this pretence for taking umbrage. Had the Engliſh Miniſter failed in point of punctilio, and made an abrupt demand, unauthorized by the law of nations, the court of Madrid might have reſented his perſonal behaviour, and complained of it by their ambaſſador at London; but, even in that caſe, the affront would have been, by all the reaſonable part of mankind, deemed too inconſiderable a cauſe for involving the two nations in the horrors and miſery of war: yet even this plea was wanting. The Earl of Briſtol proceeded with delicacy and caution, and did not inſiſt upon a categorical anſwer until every milder method had been tried without ſucceſs. The moſt extraordinary circumſtance attending this rupture was the purport of a paper delivered to the earl of Egremont, who had ſucceeded Mr. Pitt as ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department, by the count de Fuentes, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at the court of London. It ſeems to have been calculated for ſowing jealouſies and fomenting diviſions among the ſubjects of Great-Britain, and may be termed, "His catholic majeſty's declaration of war againſt the perſon of Mr. Pitt, late ſecretary of ſtate, and miniſter to the king of Great-Britain."

No meaſures were now to be kept with Spain. The earl of Briſtol was recalled: the count de Fuentes retired from England. His Britannic Majeſty granted a commiſſion, impowering the admiralty to iſſue letters of marque, and commiſſions for privateers to act againſt the ſubjects of Spain. War was declared in form on the fourth day of January; and on the nineteenth the king communicated it in a ſpeech to both houſes of parliament. He ſaid he had ſo often aſſured them of his ſincere diſpoſition to put an end to the calamities of war, and to reſtore the public tranquility on ſolid and laſting foundations, that no impartial perſon, either at home or abroad, could ſuſpect him of unneceſſarily kindling a new war in Europe. He acquainted them, that, ſince their receſs, he had found himſelf indiſpenſably obliged to declare war againſt Spain, for the cauſes ſpecified in his public declaration. He obſerved, that his own conduct, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, as well as that of the late king his grandfather, towards Spain, had been ſo full of good will and friendſhip, ſo averſe to the laying hold of ſeveral juſt grounds of complaint, which might have been alledged, and ſo attentive to the advantages of the catholick king and his family, that it was matter of the greateſt ſurprize to find that engagements had, in this conjuncture, been entered into between that crown and France; and a treaty made to unite all the branches of the houſe of Bourbon in the moſt ambitious and dangerous deſigns againſt the commerce and independency of the reſt of Europe, and particularly of theſe kingdoms. He expreſſed his reliance on the divine bleſſing on the juſtice of his cauſe, on the zealous and powerful aſſiſtance of his faithful ſubjects, and the concurrence of his allies, who muſt find themſelves involved in the pernicious and extenſive projects of his enemies. He left theſe conſiderations with his parliament, full of the juſteſt confidence, that the honour of his crown, and the intereſts of his kingdoms, were ſafe in their hands.

This ſpeech being taken into conſideration, each houſe apart preſented an addreſs, containing aſſurances of conſtant ſupport, conveyed in the moſt endearing expreſſions.

Here I muſt interrupt the narrative of parliamentary proceedings, to take notice of the reduction of the iſland of Martinique, which happened during this period.

The late miniſter had determined to employ a very conſiderable part of the force of the nation againſt the French colonies in the Weſt-Indies, and a ſtrong ſquadron was accordingly equipped. This armament ſailed from Spithead in the month of October in the preceding year, having under their convoy a number of tranſports, with four battalions from Belleiſle, to join at Barbadoes a ſtrong body of forces from North America, together with ſome regiments and volunteers from Guadalupe and the Leeward iſlands, and proceed in concert with the fleet already on that ſtation, and make a conqueſt of Martinique, which, ſince the attempt of general Hopſon, had been ſtrengthened with new fortifications, and a ſtrong body of troops. The militia were well regulated, commanded by experienced officers, and the iſland had plenty of proviſions, artillery and ammunition.

It may be neceſſary to inform the reader, that Martinique is the largeſt of all the Caribbee iſlands, ſituated between the fourteenth and fifteenth degrees of north latitude, about the middle between Barbadoes and Guadaloupe, to the windward of Antigua and St. Chriſtopher's. It extends twenty leagues in length, and may be about one hundred and and thirty miles in circumference; indented by a great number of creeks and harbours, diverſified with hill and dale, ſhaded with woods, watered by many ſtreams; in climate ſultry, in ſoil fertile, producing a very conſiderable quantity of ſugar, indigo, coffee, cotton, ginger, aloes, and pimento. Here the governor-general of all the French iſlands in this part of the world reſides; and here is eſtabliſhed the ſovereign council, whoſe juriſdiction extends over all the French Antilles, and even to the ſettlements of that crown in the iſlands of St. Domingo and Tortuga. In a word, Martinique is the moſt populous and flouriſhing of all the colonies which the French nation poſſeſs in the Weſt-Indies. Its towns and harbours were ſtrongly fortified: the country itſelf is almoſt inacceſſible on account of woods, paſſes, rivers, rocks, and ravines; and was defended by a body of regular troops, reinforced by a diſciplined militia, ſaid to conſiſt of ten thouſand white natives; and to theſe might be added four times that number of negroes, whom they could arm in caſes of neceſſity. The reduction of this iſland was an object of the greateſt conſequence to Great-Britain, not only on account of its intrinſic worth, and the detriment which the loſs of it muſt occaſion to the enemy, but likewiſe for the ſecurity of the Engliſh iſlands, amongſt which it is ſituated, and of the Britiſh trading ſhips, which were conſtantly moleſted by the privateers of Martinico.

The armament from North America and England under the command of major-general Monckton and rear-admiral Rodney, amounting to eighteen battalions, and as many ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, bombs, and fire-ſhips, having rendezvouſed at Barbadoes in the month of December, proceeded from thence on the fifth day of January; and on the eighth the fleet and tranſports anchored in St. Ann's Bay, in the eaſtern part of Martinique, after the ſhips of war had ſilenced ſome batteries, which the enemy had erected on that part of the coaſt. In the courſe of this ſervice, the Raiſonable, a ſhip of the line, was, by the ignorance of the pilot, run upon a reef of rocks, from whence ſhe could not be diſengaged, though the men were ſaved, together with her ſtores and artillery.

The general, however, judging this an improper place for a diſembarkation, two brigades, commanded by the brigadiers Haviland and Grant, were detached under convoy to the bay of Petite-Anſe, where a battery was cannonaded and taken by the ſeamen and marines. Theſe brigades were ſoon followed by the whole army, and the reſt of the ſquadron; and other batteries being ſilenced, general Monckton and the forces landed without further oppoſition on the ſixteenth, in the neighbourhood of the Cas des Navires. The brigadiers Haviland and Grant had made a deſcent in the other place, and marched to the ground oppoſite to Pidgeon-iſland, which commands the harbour of Fort-Royal; but the road being found impaſſable for artillery, Mr. Monckton altered his firſt deſign. The two brigades, however, with the light infantry under lieutenant-colonel Scot, while they remained on ſhore, were attacked in the night by a body of grenadiers, freebooters, negroes, and Mulattoes, who had been tranſported from Fort-Royal; but they met with ſuch a warm reception, as compelled them to retreat with precipitation, after having loſt a great number of men.

The troops being landed at Cas des Navires, and reinforced with two battalions of marines, which were ſent from the ſquadron, the general determined to beſiege the town of Fort-royal; but, in order to make his approaches, he found it neceſſary to attack the heights of Garnier and Tortueſon, which the enemy had fortified, and ſeemed reſolved to defend to the laſt extremity. The Engliſh commander, having raiſed a battery to protect the paſſage of a ravine which ſeparated him from thoſe heights, made a diſpoſition for the attack, which was put in execution on the twenty-fourth day of January. In the dawn of the morning, brigadier Grant, at the head of the grenadiers, ſuſtained by lord Rollo's brigade, attacked the advanced poſts of the enemy, under a briſk fire of the batteries; while brigadier Rufane, with his brigade, reinforced by the marines, marched up on the right to attack the redoubts that were raiſed along the ſhore; and the light infantry under colonel Scot, ſupported by the brigade of Walſh, advanced on the left of a plantation, in order, if poſſible, to turn the enemy.

They ſucceeded in their attempt, while the grenadiers were employed in driving the French from one poſt to another; and this motion contributed in a great meaſure to the ſucceſs of the day. By nine in the morning they were in poſſeſſion of the Morne Tortueſon, and all the redoubts and batteries with which it was fortified. The enemy retired in confuſion to the town of Fort Royal, and to the Morne Garnier, which being more high and inacceſſible than the other, was deemed impregnable. During the conteſt for the poſſeſſion of Tortueſon, brigadier Haviland, at the head of his brigade, with two battalions of highlanders, and another corps of light infantry, under major Leland, was ordered to paſs the ravine a good way to the left, and turn a body of the enemy poſted on the oppoſite heights, in hope of being able to divide their forces; but the country was ſo difficult of acceſs, that it was late before this paſſage was effected. In the mean time, the general, perceiving the enemy giving way on all ſides, ordered colonel Scot's light infantry, with Walſh's brigade, and a diviſion of the grenadiers, to advance on the left to a plantation, from whence they drove the enemy, and where they took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt oppoſite to the Morne Garnier. They were ſuſtained, on the right, by Haviland's corps, when they paſſed the ravine; and the road between the two plantations, which they occupied, was covered by the marines.

Next day the Engliſh began to erect batteries againſt the citadel of Fort-Royal: but were greatly harraſſed from Morne Garnier. On the twenty-ſeventh, about four in the afternoon, the enemy made a furious attack, with the greateſt part of their forces, on the poſts defended by the light infantry and brigadier Haviland; but met with ſo warm a reception, that they ſoon retired in diſorder. Such was the ardour of the Engliſh troops, that they paſſed the ravine with the fugitives, ſeized their batteries, and took poſſeſſion of the ground, being ſuſtained by the brigade of Walſh, and the grenadiers under Grant, who marched up to their aſſiſtance when the attack began. Major Leland, with his light infantry, finding no reſiſtance on the left, advanced to the redoubt which was abandoned; and the brigadiers Walſh, Grant, and Haviland, moved up in order to ſupport him; ſo that by nine at night the Britiſh troops were in poſſeſſion of this very ſtrong poſt, that commanded the citadel, againſt which their own artillery was turned in the morning.

The French regular troops had fled into the town, and the militia diſperſed in the country. The governor of the citadel, perceiving the Engliſh employed in erecting batteries on the different heights by which it was commanded, ordered the chamade to be bear, and ſurrendered by capitulation. On the fourth of February the gate of the citadel was delivered up to the Engliſh; and next morning the garriſon, to the number of eight hundred, marched out with the honours of war. Immediately after the reduction of Fort Royal, deputations were ſent from different quarters of the iſland, requeſting a capitulation: but the governor-general, M. de la Touche, retired with his forces to St. Pierre, which he propoſed to defend to the laſt extremity. On the ſeventh, Pidgeon iſland, which was ſtrongly fortified, and eſteemed one of the beſt defences of the harbour, ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons, and was favoured with a capitulation ſimilar to that of the citadel. It was agreed, that the troops of the French king ſhould be conveyed to Rochfort in France; that the militia ſhould lay down their arms, and remain priſoners of war, until the fate of the iſland ſhould be determined. This conqueſt was atchieved at the ſmall expence of about four hundred men, including a few officers, killed and wounded in the different attacks; but the loſs of the enemy was much more conſiderable. The moſt remarkable circumſtance of this enterprize was the ſurpriſing boldneſs and alacrity of the ſeamen, who, by force of arm, drew a number of heavy mortars and ſhips cannon up the ſteepeſt mountains to a conſiderable diſtance from the ſea, and acroſs the enemy's line of fire, to which they expoſed themſelves with undaunted reſolution. Fourteen French privateers were found in the harbour of Port Royal; and a much greater number, from other parts in the iſland, were delivered up to admiral Rodney, in conſequence of the capitulation with the inhabitants, who, in all other reſpects, were very favourably treated.

Juſt as general Monckton was going to ſet out for the reduction of St. Pierre, a very large and populous town, ſituated to the leeward of Fort-Royal, two deputies arrived with propoſals of capitulation for the whole iſland on the part of M. de la Touche, the governor-general. On the fourteenth the terms were ſettled, and the capitulation ſigned: on the ſixteenth the Engliſh commander took poſſeſſion of St. Pierre, and all the poſts in that neighbourhood; while the governor-general, with Mr. Rouille, the lieutenant-governor, the ſtaff officers, and about three hundred and twenty grenadiers, were put on board ſome tranſports, to be carried to France. That ſuch an important conqueſt ſhould be atchieved almoſt without bloodſhed, was in a great meaſure owing to the favourable capitulation which the iſland of Guadaloupe had obtained, and the good faith with which the articles of that capitulation had been obſerved by the conquerors. Indeed the inhabitants of Martinico, who were indulged with nearly the ſame terms, muſt have found themſelves conſiderable gainers by their change of ſovereign; inaſmuch as, together with the enjoyment of their own religion, laws, and property, they had now an opportunity of exporting their produce to advantage, and of being ſupplied with all neceſſaries from the dominions of Great Britain; whereas, before they fell under the Engliſh government, their commerce was almoſt entirely interrupted, and they were obliged to depend even for ſubſiſtence on the moſt precarious methods of ſupply. By the reduction of Martinico, the iſland of Antigua, St. Chriſtopher's, and Nevis, together with the ſhips trading to theſe colonies, were perfectly ſecured againſt the depredations of the enemy; and Great-Britain acquired an annual addition in commerce, at leaſt to the amount of one million ſterling.

The ſurrender of Martinique naturally drew on the ſurrender of all the dependent iſlands. Granada, a fertile iſland, and poſſeſſed of ſome good harbours, was given up without oppoſition. St. Lucia, and St. Vincent, the right to which had ſo long been objects of contention between the two nations, followed its example. The Engliſh were now the ſole and undiſturbed poſſeſſors of all the Caribbees, and held that chain of innumerable iſlands which forms an immenſe bow, extending from the eaſtern point of Hiſpaniola almoſt to the continent of South America. And though ſome of theſe iſlands are barren, none of them very large, and not many of them well inhabited, they boaſt of more trade than falls to the lot of many reſpectable kingdoms.

Before we proceed any further in relating the tranſactions of the preſent campaign, it may not be improper to take notice of ſome other particulars which diſtinguiſhed this ſeſſion of parliament.

In the courſe of the foregoing year it had been found neceſſary to lay an additional duty of three ſhillings on every barrel of beer; and as this did not immediately take place, it made little impreſſion on the minds of the people: but now that the brewers began to raiſe the price of their liquor, and the publicans in conſequence reſolved to demand one halfpenny extraordinary on every quart of ſtrong beer, the cities of London and Weſtminſter were filled with tumult. The populace denounced vengeance againſt the brewers for exacting a higher price than uſual from the victuallers; and even threatened to pull down the houſes of thoſe publicans who ſhould charge the additional halfpenny on their beer. Under the apprehenſion of theſe dangers, they petitioned the houſe of commons for ſecurity and relief: and a new law was made in their favour. It enacted, that no brewer or retailer of ſtrong beer or ale ſhould be liable to be ſued, impleaded, or moleſted, by indictment, information, popular action, or otherwiſe, for advancing the price; and that, on the other hand, they ſhould not be allowed to mix it, on any pretence whatſoever, after the gauge of it ſhould be taken by an officer of the exciſe.

Another act was paſſed to explain, amend, and reduce into one act, the ſeveral laws relating to the militia, which had been found hitherto ineffectual. By this regulation perſons liable to ſerve in the militia, may be choſen by ballot, as before; or otherwiſe the pariſh officers, with the conſent of the inhabitants, may provide volunteers, to be approved of by two deputy-lieutenants and one juſtice of the peace; and whatever expence they incur, by providing ſuch volunteers, they are impowered to reimburſe themſelves by a rate on the pariſh, to be made in proportion to that for the relief of their poor, and the overplus, if any, to go in aid to the poors rate. It is further decreed, that pariſh officers ſhall pay to every perſon choſen by lot, and ſworn in, or ſubſtitute, ſuch ſum of money, not exceeding five pounds, as any two deputy-lieutenants and a juſtice of the peace ſhall adjudge to be one half of the current price then paid for a volunteer in the county where ſuch perſon ſhall be choſen. It is likewiſe ordained, that no perſon under the age of eighteen, or above forty-five, articled clerk, apprentice, or poor man with three children born in wedlock, ſhall be compelled to ſerve: and that every perſon, who ſhall contract or agree with any other liable to ſerve, to inſure him from ſerving in the militia, by providing a ſubſtitute, or paying the penalty of ten pounds, ſhall, for ſo doing, be fined in the ſum of one hundred pounds, one half to the proſecutor, the other to the poor of the pariſh. This act was to take place from the time of its being paſſed, and is to continue in force for the ſpace of ſeven years, and from thence to the end of the next ſeſſion of parliament, and no longer. And nothing in the ſaid act is to be conſtrued to extend to the preventing perſons of the ſame pariſh, town, or place, from entering into ſubſcriptions among themſelves, for paying jointly for any ſubſtitute or ſubſtitutes, who may be provided for one or more of the ſubſcribers, who may happen to be choſen by lot. By this wiſe and wholeſome alteration in the militia-laws, which obliges, and very juſtly, every man to pay his quota, all pariſhes have it in their power to keep their good and uſeful hands at home, and by a ſmall and equitable tax, to be raiſed only twice in ſeven years, to ſend the idle and diſſolute to ſerve their king and country for three years in the militia.

By a new law for the preſervation of the game, it was decreed, that after the firſt day of June next enſuing, no partridge, pheaſant, heath-fowl, or grouſe, ſhould be killed, taken, or ſold, any year, between the twelfth day of February and firſt of September, for partridges; between the firſt of February and the firſt of October, for pheaſants; between the firſt of January and the twentieth of Auguſt, for heath-fowl, commonly called black game; and between the firſt of December and the twenty-fifth day of July, for the grouſe, commonly called the red game.—The perſon offending againſt this law to forfeit five pounds for every bird, to the proſecutor. A new act paſſed for the better lighting and paving the ſtreets of Weſtminſter, which were neither very ſafe nor commodious. A new law was alſo made for ſecuring the additional ſalaries to the puiſne judges, whom the king had rendered independent, in the courſe of the preceding ſeſſion; and by another bill, an annuity of three thouſand pounds was ſettled and ſecured for the uſe of Arthur Onſlow, Eſq; late ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.

The mutiny bill was paſſed as an annual regulation; and the parliament enacted an explanatory law for a further encouragement to thoſe who ſhould make any progreſs towards the diſcovery of a certain method for finding out the longitude at ſea, that great deſideratum in the art of navigation. Mr. Harriſon, a clock maker of London, had contrived a curious time-piece, which, under the direction of his ſon, was tried in a voyage to the Weſt-Indies, and found to ſucceed in all experiments infinitely beyond any thing which had hitherto been invented on the ſame ſubject. Mr. Irwin, a native of Ireland, had alſo contrived a marine chair, by means of which it was found practicable, in the roughеſt weather at ſea, to take obſervations of the immerſions and emerſions of Jupiter's ſatellites, from which the longitude may be aſcertained. This machine had been found ſucceſsful upon trial; and a board of longitude being now held at the Admiralty, to conſider the merit of theſe improvements, Mr. Harriſon and his ſon were gratified with a reward of fifteen hundred pounds; and five hundred were given to Mr. Irwin.

The public buſineſs being finiſhed, the king repaired to the houſe of lords on the ſecond day of June, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he expreſſed the higheſt approbation of the zeal, unanimity and diſpatch, which had ſo ſignally appeared in the courſe of their proceedings. He ſaid, he had informed them at the opening of the ſeſſion, that it had been his earneſt wiſh to reſtore the bleſſings of peace to his people; but that it was his firm reſolution, with their concurrence and ſupport, to carry on the war in the moſt effectual manner, till that deſirable object could be obtained upon equitable and honourable terms: that his ſentiments in both theſe reſpects continued invariably the ſame, and he had the ſatisfaction to find them confirmed by the unanimous voice of his parliament. He obſerved, that the ſignal ſucceſs of his arms, in the conqueſt of Martinique, and the acquiſition of many other valuable ſettlements in the Weſt-Indies, had, under the bleſſing of God, been the happy conſequences of theſe meaſures. He expreſſed his truſt in the divine providence, that they would be attended with ſtill further advantages, until the enemy ſhould be diſpoſed to ſuch terms of accommodation, as the dignity and juſt rights of his crown, and the future ſecurity and commercial intereſts of his ſubjects would permit him to accept. He ſaid, when he conſidered the ample ſupplies which they had ſo unanimouſly granted, he could not but lament the heavy burthens, which the neceſſities of the public ſervice had obliged them to impoſe upon his people: that, from theſe conſiderations, he had endeavoured, in every inſtance, to confine his demands within as narrow bounds, as the difficulties, in which he found himſelf involved, would allow: and that, from the ſame motive, his utmoſt care ſhould be employed in obſerving the moſt exact œconomy, conſiſtent with the ſafety of his kingdom, and the good faith and honour of his crown. He returned them his particular thanks for the proof, which they had given, of their regard to him and his family, in the ample proviſion they had made for the queen; whoſe virtues and affections to this country would, he was confident, be found to deſerve it. He added, he had the fulleſt perſuaſion, that they would continue to diffuſe, in their ſeveral counties, th ſpirit of concord, which they had themſelves ſo ſteadily exerted in parliament: and he aſſured them, that he would, on his part, return their zeal and affection for his perſon and government, by a conſtant attention to whatever might contribute to the eaſe of his ſubjects; and that it was his ardent wiſh to found the glories of his reign on the union of his parliaments, and on the welfare and proſperity of his people.

The moſt remarkable tranſaction that diſtinguiſhed this ſeſſion in the parliament of Ireland, was a generous reſolution in favour of their lord-lieutenant the earl of Halifax, whoſe conduct they entirely approved of, and whoſe character they held in the utmoſt veneration. They unanimouſly reſolved on an addreſs to his excellency, deſiring he would repreſent to the king the ſenſe of the houſe, that the appointments of the lord-lieutenant were become inadequate to the dignity of that office; and that it was the humble deſire of the houſe, that his majeſty would be pleaſed to grant ſuch augmentation to the lord lieutenant for the time being, as ſhould raiſe the whole to the annual ſum of ſixteen thouſand pounds. At the ſame time they expreſſed their ſatisfaction at the pleaſing hope that this augmentation ſhould take place during the adminiſtration of a chief governor whoſe many great and amiable qualities, whoſe wiſe and happy adminiſtration in the government of that kingdom, had univerſally endeared him to the people of Ireland. The earl received this glorious teſtimony of their approbation with all ſuitable acknowledgments; but, with a delicacy peculiar to himſelf, declined their propoſal that the augmentation ſhould take place during his government.

The peace of that kingdom had been for ſome time diſturbed by a ſet of licentious people, who aſſembled in the night in arms, and committed many outrages in different parts of the kingdom. They were indiſcriminately known by the name of White Boys and Levellers, becauſe they wore linen ſhirts over their cloaths, the better to diſtinguiſh each other in the dark; and levelled all the incloſures which had encroached upon commons. This, indeed, was the principal grievance of which they complained. They looked upon every diminution of a common as an injury to the poor, who had uſed to enjoy the benefit of that common. They therefore not only deſtroyed the fences which had lately been made, but alſo robbed and maltreated the authors and proprietors of thoſe encroachments. They even made head againſt ſome parties of regular troops, and ſome few lives were loſt. A report began to prevail that thoſe were no other than malcontents taking meaſures againſt the eſtabliſhed government: that they were already increaſed to a formidable number, well armed and diſciplined by officers, who had come for that purpoſe from France and other foreign countries. Theſe ſurmiſes, however, were afterwards found to have been abſolutely groundleſs, and all thoſe petty inſurrections were quelled by the vigilance and wiſe conduct of the lord-lieutenant, who, nevertheleſs, was obliged to make ſome examples of juſtice, in order to prevent ſuch diſturbances for the future.

If England was free from theſe domeſtic inſurrections, yet her internal tranquillity was diſturbed by the furious diſputes which prevailed among the miniſtry. The whole council had been almoſt unanimous to oppoſe Mr. Pitt in his ſcheme for precipitating a declaration of war againſt Spain. They thought his principles were too violent, and they did not perfectly like his perſon. When he retired from public buſineſs, it ſeemed as if they breathed more freely, and had got rid of a burthen that oppreſſed them. But he was not long removed, when it appeared, that the remaining part of the ſyſtem was framed upon principles ſo very diſcordant in themſelves, that it was by no means likely to ſtand.

The D. of N——, firſt lord of the treaſury, by his early zeal in favour of the Proteſtant ſucceſſion, by the liberal and public uſe he had made of a great fortune, by the obligations, which, in a courſe of many years, and in a ſucceſſion of great employments, he was enabled to confer on ſome of the moſt conſiderable people in the kingdom, had attached a great number to his fortunes, and formed a party in the parliament and the nation, which it was extremely difficult to overturn, or even to ſhake. He came to be conſidered as the head of the Whigs, and he was, in reality, well qualified, in many reſpects, for the chief of a party, by his unbounded liberality, by his affability, magnificence, and perſonal diſintereſtedneſs. Even the defects and faults, which might have appeared in his character, were rather of ſervice to him, as they tended to ſoften reſentments, and helped to give that great power, of which he was poſſeſſed, an appearance leſs formidable.

During a great part of the late king's reign, his family had directed all affairs without controul. On the acceſſion of his preſent majeſty, his ſituation ſeemed more doubtful; but, in a little time, he appeared outwardly as well eſtabliſhed as ever, not only in his former high employments, but in that ſhare of influence which is ſuppoſed to attend it. There was, however, very little reality in this ſpecious appearance; for he did not poſſeſs the r—— confidence, upon which all the eſſential of power depends. Neither his age, nor his ſituation in the former reign, had allowed him an opportunity of cultivating an intereſt with the preſent k——. Another noble perſon had been in an employment near his perſon; and having formed his mind with much attention and ſucceſs to thoſe virtues which adorn his ſtation, deſerved and obtained a very uncommon ſhare of his confidence.

This nobleman was firſt groom of the ſtole; afterwards engaging more openly in the conduct of affairs, he accepted the ſeals as ſecretary of ſtate. On the removal of Mr. P—, who preſerved a kind of union in the adminiſtration by their common dread of him, the only competition was between the D. of N—— and the E. of B—. The former could not well endure that decay of influence, which, on a thouſand occaſions, he muſt have ſenſibly felt, and which the great rank he held muſt have rendered only more painful. L. B—, on the other hand, could not bear to ſee the treaſury board, which, under whatever limitations, was attended with ſo much power, in the hands of his rival. It is indeed a department, the entire conduct of which is abſolutely neceſſary to the perſon, who has any pretenſions to be at the head of the Britiſh adminiſtration.

Theſe principles ſoon produced their natural effect. In a ſhort time the D. of N— thought himſelf obliged to reſign, and L. B— was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury. Mr. George Grenville, brother to earl Temple, became ſecretary of ſtate in the room of his lordſhip; and the place of firſt com-miſſioner of the admiralty being vacated by the death of lord Anſon, that office was beſtowed upon the earl of Halifax, now returned from Ireland. No one was ſurpriſed at the ferment occaſioned by theſe alterations; in which perſonal reſentment, party violence, and national or rather local prejudices, were all united, to throw every thing into confuſion.

In this ſtate of parties, a number of thoſe called Whigs, who had loſt their places, being highly irritated at the late changes, and even many of thoſe, who ſtill continued in employments, being ſuppoſed attached to the intereſt of the D. of N—, and therefore not to be depended on by the new adminiſtration, it became neceſſary to have recourſe to thoſe called Tories, or country gentlemen.

From the beginning of this reign, it had been propoſed, with the general applauſe of all good men, to aboliſh thoſe odious party diſtinctions, and to extend the royal favour and protection equally to all his majeſty's ſubjects. The perſons called Tories had, beſides, been before active in ſupport of thoſe gentlemen, who now clamoured at the very meaſures, which they had themſelves, more than once, adopted. Occaſion, however, was taken from thence to endeavour at the revival of this almoſt exploded diſtinction. The two parties were inflamed againſt each other with the moſt violent animoſity; and this was artfully blown up into a general combuſtion by every art and inſtrument of falſehood, which had ever proved effectual upon ſimilar occaſions.

Whilſt the nation was thus diſtracted, the conduct of a war became difficult; its continuance unſafe; and its ſupplies uncertain. If the adminiſtration failed, their failure would be conſtrued into incapacity: if they ſucceeded, their ſucceſs would be converted into an argument for ſuch terms of peace, as it would be impoſſible for them to procure. Above all, the ancient and known connection between the chiefs of the moneyed intereſt and the principal perſons in the oppoſition, muſt have been a ſubject of great anxiety to the adminiſtration.

Theſe cauſes co-operated to render the intentions of the Britiſh miniſtry towards peace altogether cordial and ſincere: nevertheleſs, far from relapſing in their warlike operations, they proſecuted them with redoubled vigour, that the enemy might be the ſooner reduced to the neceſſity of propoſing equitable terms of accommodation. His majeſty had already ſignified to the king of Pruſſia, that he would not renew the annual treaty, in conſequence of which a very large ſubſidy had been granted to that prince; but, at the ſame time, gave him to underſtand that he ſhould for the enſuing campaign, be ſtill accommodated with pecuniary aſſiſtance; which was refuſed on any other condition than a renewal of the treaty. With regard to the Britiſh army in Weſtphalia, he gave orders that it ſhould be ſupplied with all neceſſaries, and augmented to the number of one hundred thouſand effective men. The French were already diſpoſſeſſed of all their ſettlements in North America, except that of Louiſiana, which was not conſidered as a very important object. It was determined therefore to tranſfer the ſeat of war from that continent; to attack the French iſlands the conqueſt of which I have already deſcribed; and to make a vigorous impreſſion upon Spain, not only by attempting the reduction of the Havanna, which may be regarded as the key of the bay of Mexico; but alſo by making a deſcent on the iſland of Manilla, in the Eaſt-Indies, a country in which the French had now nothing left to be conquered.

The firſt of theſe expeditions was committed to the care of the earl of Albemarle, commander of the land forces, recommended for this ſervice by the duke of Cumberland, under whoſe auſpices he had been trained up to arms; and the ſhips of war appointed to co-operate in the attack, were commanded by Admiral Sir George Pococke, who had already diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his gallantry in the Eaſt-Indies; his ſecond was Mr. Keppel, brother to the earl, an able officer, who had reduced the iſle of Goree, on the coaſt of Africa. They ſailed from Portſmouth in the beginning of March; and arrived at the place of their deſtination without any conſiderable obſtruction. Their proceedings ſhall be particularly related in their proper place. The expedition againſt Manilla was conducted by rear-admiral Corniſh. He had ſometime before ſailed with an intention to reduce the French iſland of Bourbon or Mauritius. He was to have been joined by a reinforcement of ſhips from England, which, however, did not arrive at the place of rendezvous; and the greater part of his men being diſabled by diſtempers, he was obliged to poſtpone the undertaking, which thus miſcarried: I ſhall in due time give an account of the other, which proved more ſucceſsful.

For the ſecurity of the Britiſh coaſt, and in order to anſwer the emergencies of war, a powerful ſquadron was kept in readineſs at Spithead, under the direction of Sir Edward Hawke; another rode at anchor in the Downs, under the command of rear-admiral Moore; and from theſe two were occaſionally detached into the Channel, and all round the coaſts of the iſland, a number of light cruiſers, which exerted themſelves with ſuch vigilance and activity, that not a ſhip could ſtir from any of the French ſea-ports, without running the moſt imminent riſque of being taken; and ſcarce a day paſſed without ſeeing ſome privateer of the enemy, either French or Spaniſh, brought into the harbours of Great-Britain. Some large ſhips of war were ſtationed in the bay of Baſque, to watch the coaſt of Brittany, and in particular to have an eye upon Breſt, where ſome of the enemy's ſhips of war lay at anchor.

Sir Charles Saunders was reinforced in ſuch a manner as enabled him to maintain his ſuperiority in the Mediterranean, and either to prevent a junction of the French and Spaniſh fleets, or, if that ſhould be found impoſſible, to give them battle when joined. Lord Colville continued with his ſquadron at Halifax in Nova-Scotia, in order to protect the coaſt of North America, and the new conqueſt in the gulph and river of St. Laurence. Sir James Douglas ſtill commanded the ſhips of war appointed for the defence of the Leeward iſlands; and captain Foreſt, ſince the death of admiral Holmes, directed the ſmall ſquadron at Jamaica. Such was the general diſpoſition for the offenſive as well as the defenſive meaſures of the campaign, and, indeed, it muſt be owned, in juſtice to the miniſtry, that it was planned with ſagacity, and proſecuted with vigour.

I ſhall, as uſual, begin my narrative of military tranſactions with deſcribing the progreſs of the war on the continent of Europe.

The Bourbon alliance, it was ſtrongly ſuſpected, would ſoon be productive of ſome fatal conſequences to the reſt of Europe. It was not, however, altogether certain, where the ſtorm that was gathering would firſt fall. There were ſome apprehenſions for the peace of Italy; Holland had not a few cauſes of dread; and menaces were even uſed in that quarter. But Portugal ſeemed to be the moſt endangered, on account of her cloſe and natural connection with Great-Britain, her internal weakneſs, the ancient claims of the Catholic king, and the opportunity of invaſion; that kingdom being on all ſides, except to the ſea, in a manner incloſed by Spain.

Public conjecture was not miſtaken in fixing upon Portugal. No mention was made, indeed, of the Spaniſh pretenſions to that crown; but a reſolution was taken to oblige her not only to renounce all friendſhip, but to violate her neutrality with Great-Britain. No ſcheme was ever projected with leſs appearance of juſtice; no propoſition was ever made with more arrogance and preſumption to an independent ſovereign; and no enterprize ſeemed, according to every human appearance, ſo certain of ſucceſs.

The kingdom of Portugal, on the recovery of her liberty, which happened in the year 1640, found herſelf ſtripped of the greateſt part of thoſe acquiſitions, in both Indies, which had been the principal ſources of her wealth, and the great monuments of the capacity of her former kings and commanders. During the interval of her ſubjection, new commercial powers had riſen, ſome on the ruins of her fortune, and others upon different but not leſs ſubſtantial foundations. Though the Brazils were recovered, and Goa, and ſome other places in India, ſtill remained to Portugal, her maritime power, and the ſhare of trade, on which it depended, was altogether irrecoverable. Contrary to the fate of other nations, who have ſhaken off a foreign yoke, ſhe did not owe her liberty to the exertion of any great abilities. Whilſt the United Provinces were firſt freed, and afterwards aggrandized, by the capacity of the princes of Orange; and whilſt Pruſſia, from an inconſiderable and dependent principality, grew, by the genius of her ſovereigns, into a formidable monarchy, Portugal continued to languiſh in a ſtate of mediocrity. Without any ſymptoms of danger to her exiſtence, ſhe ſuffered a gradual decay of her power and former influence. The principles of her government were narrow and bigotted, and the whole ſyſtem of her commerce prepoſterous. If, on the one hand, a long peace added to the reſources of her revenue, it, on the other, abſolutely annihilated the ſpirit of her militia; and no country in the world had an army ſo incomplete in numbers, ſo ill furniſhed with arms, ſo deficient in diſcipline, and ſo wholly unprovided of able and experienced officers.

In this condition ſhe ſuffered a fatal blow from the earthquake in 1756. The wealthy and flouriſhing city of Liſbon was laid level with the ground: near thirty thouſand of the inhabitants were buried in the ruins; and thoſe who remained, with the court itſelf, were reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs and miſery. As if this earthquake, which had overturned their capital, had alſo ſhaken and diſtracted the frame of their government, and the temper of their minds, the moſt dreadful diſtempers broke out in the ſtate. A ſeries of horrid crimes, and of cruel puniſhments, ſucceeded to this calamity. The moſt noble and wealthy family of Portugal, having engaged itſelf in a ſacrilegious attempt on the life of their ſovereign, was cut off at once with very little diſtinction of ſex or age, by a bloody and dreadful exertion of juſtice. Many others, who were accuſed or ſuſpected, ſuffered death, or exile, or impriſonment. Among theſe, and from the ſame cauſes, one of the moſt conſiderable religious orders for wealth, influence, and policy, was ſtripped of its poſſeſſions, and entirely driven out of the country.

Theſe and the like circumſtances had thrown this unhappy kingdom into a ſtate of the moſt dangerous and dreadful confuſion. All thoſe, and they were not a few, who were attached, by connection of blood or intereſt, to the nobles that had ſuffered, or, by religious prejudice, to the jeſuits, who had been expelled, could never be cordially relied upon by the crown, and were probably but little willing to make any very vigorous efforts in favour of a government, which their reſentments muſt have repreſented to them as no better than a bloody tyranny. The Bourbon confederates had ſome ground to ſuppoſe, that Portugal, in this ſituation, would not have courage to withſtand their menaces, and much leſs ability, for any long time, to reſiſt their efforts. The Spaniſh army overſpread the frontiers of Portugal; the commerce of corn between the two kingdoms was prohibited, and every thing ſeemed to threaten a ſudden invaſion.

In the midſt of theſe hoſtile preparations the French and Spaniſh ambaſſadors at the court of Lisbon preſented to the Portugueſe miniſtry a joint memorial, importing, that the two ſovereigns of France and Spain, being obliged to ſupport a war againſt the Engliſh, had found it proper and neceſſary to eſtabliſh ſeveral mutual and reciprocal obligations between them, and to take other indiſpenſable meaſures to curb the pride of the Britiſh nation, which, by an ambitious project, to become deſpotic over the ſea, and conſequently over all maritime commerce, pretended to keep dependent the poſſeſſions of other powers in the new world, in order to introduce themſelves there, either by an underhand uſurpation, or by conqueſt: that the firſt meaſure which the kings of France and Spain had agreed on, was to have the moſt Faithful king in their offenſive and defenſive alliance, and to deſire him to join their majeſties forthwith: that they expected, that the moſt Faithful king would acquieſce therein, conformably to what he owed to himſelf, and to his kingdom, ſince his ſubjects felt, much more than other nations, the yoke which Great-Britain laid upon them, and which ſhe meant to extend over all thoſe, who had poſſeſſions beyond ſea: that it would be unjuſt for France and Spain to ſacrifice themſelves for an object, in which Portugal was ſo much intereſted; and that, inſtead of aſſiſting them, ſhe would make it impoſſible for them them to ſucceed, by allowing the Engliſh to enrich themſelves by her commerce, and to enter her ports, not only to make uſe of them as an aſylum, but to be more at hand to hurt the defenders of Portugal: that in this ſpirit, the ambaſſador of Spain, and the miniſter plenipotentiary of France, deſired the moſt Faithful king to declare himſelf united with their Catholic and moſt Chriſtian majeſties in the preſent war againſt the Engliſh, to break off all correſpondence and commerce with that power, as the common enemy of all the three, and even of all maritime nations; to ſend away from his ports, and to ſhut them againſt all their men of war and merchant-ſhips; and to join to the forces of France and Spain, thoſe which the Moſt High had put in his hands, in order to make them equal to thoſe of the enemy: that this declaration was made by the two monarchs of France and Spain, as being agreed and concerted between them; his Catholic majeſty had, in the mean time, inſtructed his ambaſſador to make this reflection to the moſt Faithful king (in order that his magnanimous breaſt might the more eaſily and the more ſpeedily determine, without being ſtopped by other impreſſions, to take the part the moſt conſonant to his advantage and to his glory) that it was the brother of the queen his wife, a true friend, and a moderate and quiet neighbour, who had made this propoſal to him, and who had agreed to it, conſidering the intereſts of the moſt Faithful king as his own, and wiſhing to unite the one with the other, ſo as that, either in peace or in war, Spain and Portugal might be conſidered as belonging to one maſter; and in order to that, if any power ſhould think of making war with Spain, they might not imagine they ſhould find, in his own houſe, ſhelter and ſuccours to attack her, as it happened, with regard to Portugal, in the wars, which king Philip the fifth, his father, and father-in-law of the moſt Faithful king, was obliged to ſupport againſt England: how much more glorious, he aſked, and more uſeful would it be for the moſt Faithful king to have, for his ally, a Catholic king, a near relation, his neighbour in Europe and America, to aſſiſt each other mutually with eaſe, than the Engliſh nation, incapable, by their haughtineſs, of conſidering other ſovereigns with equality, and always deſirous to make them feel the influence of their power? and what occaſion could the moſt Faithful king have for the aſſiſtance of England, when, by an offenſive and defenſive league, he ſhould be united with Spain and France? That theſe conſiderations were ſo ſtrong, that the Catholic king thought there could be no doubt, but that the moſt Faithful king, his brother-in-law, would yield to them, without ſtopping a moment; ſo much the more, as his Catholic majeſty, before making this invitation, and in order to prevent the danger which the maritime places of Portugal might run, when the part taken by his moſt Faithful majeſty ſhould come to the knowledge of the Engliſh, had cauſed his troops to march to the frontiers of Portugal, ſo that, in a very few days, they might garriſon the principal ports of the kingdom, and they would do it, after the anſwer of the moſt Faithful king, which, doubtleſs, would be as ſpeedy, as clear, and as deciſive as the neceſſity, and the poſitive determination of his Catholic majeſty to prevent the deſigns of his enemies, required.

To this extraordinary memorial the two miniſters added, that they were ordered by their courts to demand a categorical anſwer in four days; and that any delay, beyond that period, would be conſidered as a negative.

The ſituation of Portugal was at this time truly deplorable. If contrary to her known intereſts, contrary to her ancient connections, and to the faith of treaties, ſhe ſhould engage in this offenſive alliance, ſhe muſt expect to ſee her territories and her colonies expoſed to the formidable navies of England. This dangerous condeſcenſion however, would not have ſecured her: by her own act, ſhe would have put herſelf, bound hand and foot, into the power of the Bourbon alliance; and having received foreign garriſons into all her places of ſtrength, would have reduced herſelf to the condition of a province of Spain. If, on the other hand, ſhe adhered to her faith, and attempted to maintain her independency, an army of ſixty thouſand men was ready to enter her territories, which contained no place of real ſtrength, and which had not twenty thouſand troops, and thoſe ill armed, and worſe diſciplined, to defend them.

In this emergency, the firmneſs of the king of Portugal was eminent, and ſuch as muſt tranſmit his name to poſterity with the moſt diſtinguiſhed advantage. He reſolved ſteadily to adhere to his ancient and natural alliance, and to brave all dangers and difficulties, that he might preſerve his fidelity inviolable; following that noble maxim of king John of France, that if good faith were to be baniſhed from all other parts of the world, it ought to be found in the breaſt of ſovereigns.

His anſwer to this inſulting propoſition was humble and moderate, but firm. He obſerved, that the ties, which equally united him to Great-Britain, and the two crowns, rendered him as proper a mediator to them all, as they made it improper for him to declare himſelf an enemy to any of them: that his alliance with England was ancient, and therefore could give no offence at this juncture: that it was purely defenſive, and therefore innocent in all its circumſtances: that the late ſufferings of Portugal diſabled her, (in caſe ſhe were willing) from taking part in an offenſive war, into the calamities of which, neither the love his Faithful majeſty bore his ſubjects as a father, nor the duty by which he was bound to them as a king, could ſuffer him to plunge them. Finally, he reminded the Catholic king of his pacific diſpoſitions, by which on former occaſions, he had yielded ſo much to preſerve peace between the two crowns.

This reaſonable and moderate anſwer drew on replies, which more and more diſcloſed the true ſpirit of the Bourbon confederacy. They denied that the alliance with England was purely defenſive or entirely innocent; and for this unheard of reaſon, that the defenſive alliance was converted into an offenſive one, "from the ſituation of the Portugueſe dominions, and from the nature of the Engliſh power." They ſaid, that the Engliſh ſquadrons could not keep the ſea at all ſeaſons, nor cruize on the principal coaſts for cutting off the French and Spaniſh navigation, without the ports and aſſiſtance of Portugal: that theſe iſlanders could not inſult all the maritime powers of Europe, if all the riches of Portugal did not pass into their hands: that therefore Portugal furnished them with the means of making war; and that, of consequence, their alliance with the court of Great-Britain was offensive.

This most certainly is the first time, that ever the situation of a country was given as a reason, however it may have served as a secret motive, for declaring war against it. Nor was it ever before heard, that the common advantages of trade, derived from a neutral nation, could be considered as an act of hostility. These were rather insults than arguments; and the whole proceedings of the Bourbon family were in the same strain. They undertook to judge for Portugal of the pretended yoke which was imposed upon her by England, and which she could not herself discover; to resent some injuries for her, which she had never felt; and to avenge others, for which she had received and accepted satisfaction: and as if this kind of indignity was not sufficient, they insultingly informed the king of Portugal, "that he ought to be glad of the necessity, which they laid upon him, to make use of his reason, in order to take the road of his glory, and the common interest." This necessity was the immediate march of their army to take possession of his dominions.

So extraordinary a treatment could neither divert the king from the firmness of his resolution, nor provoke him to depart from the moderation of his language. He maintained, that the treaties of peace and commerce, which subsisted between Portugal and Great-Britain, were such as the law of God, of nature, and of nations, had always deemed innocent. He intreated their most Christian and Catholic majesties to open their eyes to the crying injustice of pursuing against Portugal, the war kindled against Great-Britain. He desired them to consider, that they were giving an example, which would produce the destruction of mankind; that there would be an end of the public safety, if neutral nations were to be attacked, because they had defensive treaties with the belligerant powers: that a maxim so destructive would occasion the desolation of all Europe, the moment a war was kindled between any two states: that, therefore, if their troops should enter his dominions, he would, in defence of his neutrality, endeavour to repulse them with all his forces, and those of his allies; and he concluded with this magnanimous declaration, "that it would affect him less, though reduced to the last extremity, of which the Great Judge was the sole arbiter, to let the last tile of his palace fall, and to see his faithful subjects spill the last drop of their blood, than to sacrifice, together with the honour of his crown, all that Portugal held most dear; and to submit, by such extraordinary means, to become an unheard of example to all pacific powers, who would no longer be able to enjoy the benefit of neutrality, whenever a war should be kindled between other powers, with which the former were connected by defensive treaties." When this final resolution was thus spiritedly signified, passports were demanded for the ambassadors of the two crowns, who immediately departed, and in the month of June, France and Spain, jointly, declared war against Portugal.

By this time the British succours had arrived in Portugal, to the number of about eight thousand troops, partly drawn from Belleisle, and partly from Ireland, where two regiments of Roman catholics had been raised for this service, and a fine train of artillery was provided, together with large supplies of stores and ammunition. The king of Portugal had bestowed the supreme command of his army upon the count de Lippe Buckebourg, an officer of distinguished abilities, who had directed the artillery of the British army in Westphalia during the whole course of this war. He was accompanied by one of the princes of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, brother to the queen of Great-Britain, who resolved to make this campaign in the Portuguese service. The English auxiliaries were conducted by the lord Tyrawley and the earl of Loudon; lieutenant-general Townshend, who had served with such reputation in America, was the next in command; and the subordinates were lord George Lenox, with the brigadiers Crawford and Burgoyne; the former of these last had been governor of Belleisle, where he was now succeeded by colonel Forrester, an accomplished officer, equally distinguished for his wit, politeness, and humanity; the other commanded a regiment of light horse, which were now numbered among the English troops who served in Portugal. Besides these, several natives of North-Britain, who had learned the art of war in the English or foreign service, were recommended for their merit to his Portuguese majesty, who promoted them to the command of regiments in his army.

Lord Tyrawley, disgusted at the behaviour of the court of Lisbon, and greatly disappointed in his expectations of the exertion they had promised to make of their own force, as well as of the use they had made of the succours from England, desired, in a short time, to be recalled to his own country, and was succeeded, in command, by the earl of Loudon, who, in conjunction with the count de la Lippe, resolved to begin the campaign without further delay.

The Spanish forces had been divided into three separate bodies, with a view to penetrate into Portugal by as many different avenues. The marquis de Sarria, who commanded the bulk of their army, consisting of thirty-six battalions and thirty-five squadrons, passed the rivers Douro and Essa, below Zamora. The body assembled in Galicia amounted to eight battalions of regular troops, six of militia, and two squadrons of horse; and the third in Andalusia amounted to four battalions regular, and the same number of militia, with eight squadrons of cavalry. The design was to form one camp between Villa-real, Braga and Oporto; a second under Abrantes; and a third in the neighbourhood of Elvas; so that their principal objects seemed to be Lisbon and Oporto, the two most important cities and sea ports of Portugal, and the centers of the whole English commerce with that kingdom.

The first attempt of consequence they made was the siege of Miranda, which they invested in the beginning of May; but, before any battery could be erected, the magazine of the place taking fire by accident, and blowing up, made two large breaches in the walls, and about five hundred men of the garrison lost their lives by the explosion.

In consequence of this misfortune, the Portuguese garrison surrendered themselves prisoners of war, war, and the Spaniſh troops took poſſeſſion of the city. From hence the marquis de Sarria ſent a detachment to attack the town of Braganza; but the garriſon retired with precipitation at their approach, and the magiſtrates preſented the keys of the town to the Spaniſh commander. No ſteps had been taken for putting thoſe two places in a proper poſture of defence. In the courſe of the ſame month, colonel Alexander O Reily, being detached by the marquis of Sarria with a body of light armed horſe and infantry, to make an attempt upon Chaves, that officer executed his orders with equal activity and ſucceſs. He marched through bye-roads above fourteen leagues in two days, and ſhewed himſelf all of a ſudden at the gates of the place: but it was already abandoned by the garriſon, though it conſiſted of two thouſand effective men, and the town was well provided with artillery, ammunition, ſtores, and proviſion for a vigorous defence. Theſe, however, were rendered uſeleſs by the ruinous ſtate of the fortifications, which had been long neglected.

After theſe exploits, the Spaniſh forces made an attempt to enter the province of Minho; but finding the paſſes of Monte Allegre defended by ſome regiments of militia, under the command of Don John de Lancaſtro, and Don Franciſco Joſeph Sarmiento; they changed their route, and reſolved to paſs the mountains of Maran and Amarante, that they might advance directly to the city of Oporto: precautions however had been taken to obſtruct their paſſage, and ſome regular troops were ordered to garriſon the city thus menaced. Part of the enemy that remained at Miranda had, in attempting to paſs the river Douro, near Villa nova de Foſcoa, been repulſed by the inhabitants, ſupported by ſome militia, who were now reinforced by a detachment of regular forces, under the command of the marquis de Angeja, and the count de Arcos. On the ſide of Almeida, the enemy, to the number of eight thouſand, paſſed the frontier in the beginning of June, and encamped between Val-de-la-mula, and Val de Coelha, from whence they had detached parties to lay waſte the country. In the province of Tralos-montes, the Spaniſh army was divided into three ſeparate bodies, the principal of which was encamped in the neighbourhood of Miranda, the other at Torre de Moncorvo.

The army of Portugal, when aſſembled, was in no condition to face the enemy in the open field. All that could be done was to harraſs them in their advances through a barren country, rendered almoſt impaſſable by ſteep mountains and narrow paſſes. In ravaging the open country, the Spaniſh detachments committed ſome barbarities upon the peaſants, and theſe were retaliated with intereſt; for an inveterate enmity has for a long time ſubſiſted between the common people of theſe two nations, inflamed by former wars, and maintained by a long courſe of mutual rapine and other offices of bad neighbourhood. That body which had encamped near Val-de la-mula, being conſiderably reinforced from Eſtremadura, and ſupplied with a train of artillery and other implements of ſiege, inveſted Almeyda in the month of July. On the twenty-fifth their trenches were opened, and next day they were joined by the French auxiliaries, to the number of eight thouſand. On the twenty-fifth day of Auguſt the garriſon capitulated, and the Spaniards took poſſeſſion of the place, which made a much better defence than was expected.

The count de la Lippe, from the moment of his arrival in Portugal, took every ſtep which military ſkill and prudence could dictate to form the troops to a regular diſcipline by the example of the Engliſh auxiliaries, who were mingled in due proportions with the different detachments poſted in ſundry parts of the kingdom, ſo as to guard the paſſes of the mountains, harraſs and annoy the enemy in their progreſs, intercept their convoys, and cut off their parties.

He then reſolved to attack Valencia d'Alcantara, on the frontiers of Portugal, where, according to the intelligence he had received, the enemy had eſtabliſhed large magazines of flour and forage. The place was at a conſiderable diſtance, and the deſign required uncommon courage, conduct, and expedition. The execution of this enterprize he committed to brigadier Burgoyne, who, on the twenty-fifth day of July, croſſed the Tagus at midnight, with four hundred of his own dragoons, and put himſelf at the head of all the Britiſh grenadiers, commanded by lord Pulteney, and eleven companies of Portugueſe grenadiers, with two pieces of light artillery, and two howitzers. Having marched through the country to Apallem, on the morning of the twenty-fifth he advanced to Caſtel-Vida, where, arriving late at night, he was joined by ſome infantry, and irregular cavalry, with forty-eight armed peaſants; and here he made his final diſpoſition, in conſequence of the advices he received with regard to the ſituation and the ſtate of the place he was determined to attack. Notwithſtanding all the diſpatch he could make in the night, he found himſelf overtaken by day-light, before he could reach Valencia; ſo that he was obliged to alter the diſpoſition he had made, and advance with the cavalry at full gallop, in hopes of ſurpriſing the place. He accordingly entered the town ſword in hand, diſperſed the guards that were in the great ſquare, and occupied the ends of the ſtreets, having met with little or no reſiſtance. Some deſperate parties attacked the regiment when it was drawn up in the ſquare, but they were all killed or taken. When the grenadiers arrived they ſuſtained ſome loſs by firings from windows, which however ſoon ceaſed, when the brigadier declared that he would ſet fire to the town at the four quarters of it, if they would not deſiſt. A detachment of dragoons being ſent out to ſcour the country, brought in ſome priſoners, with a good number of horſes. A Britiſh ſerjeant and ſix men only, falling in with a ſubaltern of the enemy, at the head of twenty-five dragoons, unbroken and prepared for action, killed ſix, made all the reſt priſoners, and took the horſes of the whole party. Major general Don Michael d'Iruniberri, and Kalanca his aid-de-camp, one colonel with his adjutant, two captains, ſeventeen ſubalterns, fifty-nine ſoldiers, with three pair of colours, a great quantity of arms and ammunition, fell into the hands of the victor, who brought away hoſtages for the care of the wounded, and the payment of the king's revenue for one year, which he exacted as a conſideration for having ſpared the town and convents. Lieutenant colonel Somerville, lord Pulteney, and major Singleton, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in this action, which coſt the Britiſh troops but one lieutenant, one ſerjeant, and three men killed, with ten horſes, and about twenty private men wounded. The information which the count had received about the magazine, was groundleſs; but the Spaniſh major-general d'Iruniberri was to have invaded Alentejo in a few days, with a conſiderable detachment, and when taken was actually employed in reconnoitring the entrance into that province.

The Spaniſh army, now commanded by the Conde de Aranda, having left garriſons in Almeyda and Caſtel Rodrigo, advanced by Alfayates to Caſtel Branco; and this motion conſtrained the count de la Lippe to relinquiſh his ſtrong camp at Ponte de Murcella in the Beira, from whence he marched back into Eſtremadura. On the eighteenth day of September, he arrived at Abrantes; and lord Loudon, with a ſeparate corps, encamped at Sardoel in the neighbourhood. The buſineſs now was to prevent the Spaniards from forcing a paſſage through the mountains in their front, and from croſſing the river Tagus at Villa-velha. For theſe purpoſes the marſhal count de la Lippe ordered the count St. Jago, with four battalions, ſix companies of grenadiers, and a regiment of cavalry, to occupy the ſtrong paſs of Alvito, which had been always deemed impregnable; and brigadier general Burgoyne, with part of his own regiment, the royal volunteers, and the Engliſh grenadiers, encamped on the ſouthern bank of the Tagus, over-againſt Villa-velha, where the great road from Caſtel Branco croſſes the river into Alentejo.

Such was the diſpoſition, when the enemy, on the firſt day of October, made ſeveral movements towards both theſe advanced bodies: they placed ſix thouſand men over-againſt the corps of the count St. Jago, and attacked upon his right the old Mooriſh caſtle of Villa-velha, at the ſame time aſſaulting a poſt upon his left, commanded by a major at the defile of St. Simon. Though brigadier Burgoyne for ſeveral days protected the caſtle of Villa-velha, by his cannon acroſs the river, it was at length reduced, and the poſt of St. Simon taken: the enemy likewiſe made themſelves maſters of the paſſes of the mountains; ſo that the corps commanded by the count St. Jago was in the utmoſt danger of being attacked by ſuperior forces, in front and rear.

In this emergency, the mareſchal ordered lord Loudon to advance and cover the retreat of the count, who had inſtructions to retire. His lordſhip immediately proceeded with great expedition by the ſhorteſt road through the mountains, to Soubrira-formoſa, where he was joined by major Macbean of the artillery, with four regimental field-pieces. The enemy, perceiving their intention to retreat, detached a ſtrong body over the river Alvito, to attack the rear-guard, which was formed of four Engliſh regiments, ſix companies of Portugueſe grenadiers, a few light dragoons, a regiment of Portugueſe cavalry, with the four field-pieces, the whole under his lordſhip's command. The retreat was conducted with ſuch good order and countenance, that not a man was loſt, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the enemy, who, being terribly annoyed by the artillery, thought proper to deſiſt, while the forces of Portugal continued their march unmoleſted towards Cardegas.

The enemy having, by theſe motions, weakened their corps at Villa-velha, brigadier Burgoyne ſeized this favourable opportunity to ſurpriſe them in their quarters. He directed lieutenant-colonel Lee, with a detachment of Britiſh troops, to ford the Tagus in the night, and fall upon the Spaniſh camp. This gallant officer executed the plan with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs, while the brigadier pointed his cannon, and made a falſe attack on the other ſide, to amuſe and diſtract the enemy. The colonel having happily croſſed the ford, and made himſelf maſter of a little village near the mountain of Villa-velha, where the Spaniſh magazines were eſtabliſhed, entered their camp without being perceived, and a conſiderable ſlaughter enſued. The enemy being at length alarmed, began to make a confuſed and irregular defence; but being vigorouſly puſhed by the grenadiers and volunteers, who uſed their bayonets without firing, they found it impoſſible to form, and were obliged to ſubmit. The only part of them that made a regular ſtand was a body of horſe, which lieutenant Maitland, at the head of Burgoyne's dragoons, attacked and routed in a few minntes. Moſt of the Spaniſh officers, including a brigadier-general, were killed in endeavouring to rally their forces. Four cannon were ſpiked up in their camp: their magazines were deſtroyed; ſome priſoners were taken, together with a good number of horſes and mules, and a conſiderable quantity of valuable baggage. The loſs of the Engliſh on this occaſion, amounted only to ten men and horſes.

This advantage being obtained in a critical moment, was attended with important advantages. The ſeaſon was now far advanced; immenſe rains fell at this time; the roads were deſtroyed; the country became impracticable; and the Spaniards, having ſecured no advanced poſts in which they could maintain themſelves during the winter, and being eſpecially unprovided with magazines for the ſupport of their horſe, every where fell back to the frontiers of Spain, where their ſupplies were at hand, and where they were not liable to be harraſſed by the efforts of the combined army.

In this manner Portugal was ſaved, at leaſt for that campaign, by the wiſe conduct of the count de la Lippe, and the diſtinguiſhed valour of the Engliſh commanders and ſoldiery: all that was wanting towards their deliverance was accompliſhed by the ſucceſs of the Engliſh army in more diſtant quarters, and by the peace, in which ſo valuable and expoſed an ally was not neglected. There never was, probably, ſo heavy a ſtorm of national calamity, ready to fall upon an unprovided people, ſo happily averted, or ſo ſpeedily blown over. Every thing, at the beginning of the campaign, bore the moſt lowering and ominous aſpect to the affairs of Great-Britain. As it advanced, the ſky continually cleared up; and the fortune of no nation, towards the cloſe of it, was enlivened with a more brilliant and more unclouded proſperity.

Having thus related, with as much brevity as was conſiſtent with perſpicuity, the military operations in Portugal, I ſhall now take notice of the ſtate of the ſeveral courts of Europe, and then proceed to deſcribe the progreſs of the war in Germany, which ſtill continued to be the principal object of attention.

The States general of the United Provinces ſtill perſiſted in maintaining their neutrality, and in endeavouring to allay the heats occaſioned by the miſunderſtanding between their Eaſt-India company and that of England. Their Eaſt-India factors had publiſhed an account of the mutual hoſtilities which had been committed in the river of Bengal; and this piece, which was artfully calculated to throw the blame of aggreſſion upon the Engliſh, was fully refuted by an anſwer publiſhed at London, under the ſanction of authentic documents. At length the directors of the Dutch company propoſed an accommodation. The propoſal was accepted by the Engliſh directors, and a deputation of merchants from Amſterdam were ſent over to London for this purpoſe, which was happily accompliſhed. The merchants of Holland ſtill murmured at the capture of their ſhips by the Engliſh cruiſers, and, in the courſe of this year, loudly complained that their neutrality was again violated by a Britiſh ſloop, which drove on ſhore and deſtroyed a French privateer on the coaſt of Scheveling: but the ſtates were too wiſe to enter into the reſentments of the people; they knew their merchants had provoked this treatment, by carrying on a contraband commerce ever ſince the beginning of the war, in favour of the enemies of Great-Britain; nor would they allow ſuch a petty inſult as that of the Britiſh cruiſer, to come in competition with the friendſhip of the Britiſh monarch, which, therefore, they continued aſſiduouſly to cultivate.

The domeſtic tranquillity of France was ſtill diſturbed by the diſpute between the parliaments and the Jeſuits. We have already remarked, that the ſociety had been condemned by arrets or decrees of the parliaments of Paris, Normandy, and Bretagne, in conſequence of the doctrines which they taught and promulgated in favour of equivocation and mental reſervation, excuſing regicide, homicide, perjury, profanation, impurity, and irreligion; in ſhort, the breach of every moral duty, upon certain occaſions. The edict iſſued by the king for ſuſpending the execution of the ſentence againſt the Jeſuits, the parliaments refuſed to regiſter. That of Paris publiſhed a new arret in April, containing extracts from the books of the Jeſuits to the amount of a large quarto volume, which was preſented to the king at Verſailles by the firſt preſident, at the head of twenty members. Mean while the Jeſuits, truſting, in all probability, to their great intereſt among the clergy, and their own addreſs, which had ſeldom failed them, ſtill delayed the payment which they had been condemned to make to their creditors; and in conſequence of this delay, the parliament of Paris iſſued a new arret in the courſe of the ſame month, for ſequeſtrating all their effects within their juriſdiction. Nevertheleſs, they ſtill continued to ſell their merchandize for ready money until a guard was placed upon their college in the Ruë St. Jaques; and places were appointed for taking informations concerning their effects. In a word, they were now become ſo unpopular with the nation in general, and the clamour againſt them grew ſo loud, that the king found it neceſſary to give them up to juſtice. All their colleges were ſeized; all their effects confiſcated; and, with reſpect to France, the order itſelf was annihilated.

As the navy of France had, for ſome time, been almoſt totally annihilated, ſeveral communities of that kingdom engaged to build ſhips of war for the king's ſervice; and large ſums were ſubſcribed by individuals for the purpoſe. After the concluſion of the laſt campaign, the court of Verſailles became the ſcene of intrigues, between the prince of Soubiſe and the mareſchal duke de Broglio, who accuſed each other, and, in all appearance, were both equally guilty, of having retarded and impeded the operations of the laſt campaign, by their mutual jealouſies and animoſity. In this civil conteſt, the prince de Soubiſe, being ſupported by the intereſt of madame de Pompadour, gained a complete victory over his rival, who was deprived of his command, and, together with his brother, baniſhed from court, to the great mortification of the people, who looked upon the mareſchal as a general of ſuperior abilities. It was now reſolved that the prince de Soubiſe ſhould command the army in Weſtphalia, in conjunction with the count d'Eſtrees, who was eſteemed an excellent officer; and that another army ſhould be aſſembled on the lower Rhine, under the command of the prince de Condé, whoſe high rank was not the greateſt of his qualifications.

The king of Spain was ſo bent upon proſecuting the war againſt Portugal, that he ſeems to have taken little pains in ſecuring his Weſt Indian ſettlements from the reſentment of Great-Britain, which he had ſo injudiciouſly provoked. True it is, the moment his council reſolved upon a war with England, he ſent three ſhips of war, with four tranſports, having on board two battalions of troops, with artillery and ammunition from Ferrol to the Weſt-Indies; and diſpatched ſeveral veſſels with advice of the rupture to his American colonies; but conſidering the riſque of their being intercepted by the Britiſh cruiſers, who covered the ſea, he ought not to have ruſhed precipitately into the war, until his ſettlements had been put into a proper poſture of defence, and every other neceſſary precaution had been taken.

We have ſeen, in the cloſe of the laſt year, that, by the taking of Colberg, on the one hand, and Schweidnitz, on the other, the king of Pruſſia's dominions were intirely at the mercy of his enemies: his forces were worn away, and even his efforts had gradually declined: a complete victory, though this was an event not at all probable, could not ſave him. The Ruſſians, by wintering in Pomerania, and by the poſſeſſion of Colberg, which inſured them ſupplies by a ſafe and expeditious channel, were in a condition to commence their operations much earlier than uſual, as well as to proſecute them with greater ſpirit and perſeverance. No reſource of policy could be tried with the leaſt proſpect of ſucceſs. After ſuch a reſiſtance, for five years, of which the world had never furniſhed another example, the king of Pruſſia had nothing left but ſuch a conduct as might cloſe the ſcene with glory, ſince there was ſo little likelihood of his concluding the war with ſafety.

In the midſt of theſe gloomy appearances, his inveterate and inflexible enemy, the empreſs of Ruſſia, died, in the ſixty-third year of her age, and the twenty-ſecond of her reign.

She was ſucceeded on the throne by her nephew Charles-Peter-Ulric, a prince of the houſe of Holſtein, ſtein, who had been created by his aunt grand duke of Ruſſia, and now aſſumed the ſceptre under the name of Peter III. None but thoſe who were intimately acquainted with the character and diſpoſition of the new Czar, could have any reaſon to imagine, that he would abandon the ſyſtem of his predeceſſor, which was certainly founded on the true intereſts of the country ſhe governed. The king of Pruſſia himſelf ſeemed, for ſome time, to have entertained no great hopes from this change. The Czar had, however, on many occaſions, diſcovered marks of eſteem for the character of that monarch. He was a knight of the black eagle, of which order the king of Pruſſia is grand maſter. His Pruſſian majeſty, however, could derive no great hopes from this circumſtance.

The eyes of all Europe were now fixed upon the ſteps which the new Czar might take. With regard to the government of his country, nothing could be more popular and auſpicious than his firſt meaſures. The earlieſt uſe he made of his abſolute power, was to ſet the Ruſſian nobility and gentry free, and to put them on the ſame footing with thoſe of their rank in the other more moderate governments of Europe. Almoſt all the exiles were recalled to court, and among the reſt the unfortunate count Biron, who, from a ſovereign prince, had been reduced to the moſt wretched condition, in the moſt wretched country on the globe. He had been many years a peaſant of Siberia, and is now once more become a ſovereign prince. It is in theſe deſpotic governments we ſee the moſt ſtriking exceſſes, and diſmal reverſes of fortune; in which one day a perſon is raiſed to ſomething almoſt above man, and the next is, perhaps in a moment, degraded to the loweſt ſtation of humanity.

The new emperor proceeded, in his reformation, to aboliſh ſome ſevere and tyrannical juriſdictions; and extending the ſame benign diſpoſition to all degrees of his ſubjects, he leſſened the tax upon the ſalt, to the very great and univerſal relief of the poor.

Thoſe beginnings gave the moſt favourable impreſſions of his domeſtic government; but Europe was principally concerned in his foreign politics; nor was it long before his diſpoſitions to peace became apparent. What aſtoniſhed the world moſt, was the high rate at which he valued this bleſſing. In a memorial which he cauſed to be delivered, on the twenty-third day of February, to the miniſters of the allied courts, he declared, "that in order to the eſtabliſhment of peace, he was ready to ſacrifice all the conqueſts made by the arms of Ruſſia in this war, in hopes that the allied courts would, on their part, equally prefer the reſtoration of peace and tranquillity to all the advantages which they might expect from the continuance of the war, but which they could not obtain but by a continuance of the effuſion of human blood."

The allies praiſed the diſintereſtedneſs, ſpirit, and humanity of this declaration; but recommended to his attention the fidelity to treaties, which conſtitutes a no leſs valuable part of the royal character, and a no leſs conſiderable branch of the duty of a monarch to his ſubjects. They ſhewed a diſpoſition to imitate his deſire for peace, but by no means to follow his example in purchaſing it by a ceſſion of all the advantages, which they had acquired or hoped to acquire by the war.

The Czar having thus far complied with decency, and being of a temper little fitted to wait the ſlow procedure of a joint negociation, gave way to his ardent deſires for peace, and to the ſentiments of that extravagant admiration which he had conceived for the king of Pruſſia. A ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities was concluded between them on the ſixteenth of March; and it was followed, not long after, by a treaty of peace and alliance. Nothing was ſtipulated by the Czar in favour of his former confederates, whom he entirely abandoned. He even agreed to join his troops to thoſe of the king of Pruſſia, to act againſt them. In a little time a Ruſſian army was ſeen with one of Pruſſia, to drive out of Sileſia thoſe very Auſtrians, who had been a few months before brought into that province by the Ruſſian arms.

This was a miraculous revolution. Fortune, who had ſo long abandoned the king of Pruſſia to the reſources of his genius, after having perſecuted him for near five years, and overwhelmed him with the whole weight of her anger, at length made him amends, and did for him at one ſtroke, the only thing, by which he could poſſibly be ſaved.

Sweden, who, ſince ſhe has recovered her liberty, has loſt her political influence, and for a long time acted entirely under the direction of Ruſſian councils, followed, on this, as on all other occaſions, the example of the court of Peterſburg, and on the twenty-ſecond of May, ſigned a treaty of peace with the king of Pruſſia.

In order to account for whatever was not the reſult of mere perſonal character in this extraordinary revolution of politics in Ruſſia, it will be neceſſary to take notice, once more, that the Czar Peter the third was duke of Holſtein; and that the dukes of Holſtein had pretenſions to the dutchy of Sleſwick. Theſe pretenſions were given up by a treaty in 1732. But as the ceſſion made by the houſe of Holſtein in this treaty was the effect of neceſſity, it had been always apprehended, that ſhe would make uſe of the firſt fair opportunity of re-aſſerting her ancient rights. The Czar ſeized eagerly on the great once, which the poſſeſſion of the whole Ruſſian power afforded him, and he reſolved to enter into an immediate war for this object, to which his predilection for his native country gave, in his eyes, a far greater importance than to all the conqueſts of his predeceſſor. As long as the war with the king of Pruſſia laſted, it was impoſſible that his deſigns againſt Denmark could be proſecuted with any hope of ſucceſs. Wholly indifferent, therefore, to all others, and paſſionately fond of this object, as ſoon as he came to the throne, without any diſpute or negociation, he offered the king of Pruſſia in his great diſtreſs every thing he could have hoped from a ſeries of victories; and whilſt he joined his arms to thoſe of that monarch in Sileſia, he cauſed an army to march towards Holſtein.

Thus the peace with Ruſſia, far from conducing to the general peace of Europe, did very little more than change the face of the war. It brought in new ſubjects of diſpute, and new parties, and by threatening Denmark, left not a ſingle power in the North in a ſtate of aſſured tranquillity.

The king of Denmark, though menaced by ſo formidable a power engaged in purſuit of a favourite object, was not terrified into any mean conceſſions. He recruited his army, repaired his fortifications, and prepared for his defence, with temper and magnanimity. As money muſt be neceſſary for the ſervices of ſo important a war; as his country could furniſh no great ſupplies; and the borrowings in every part of Europe, together with the ſudden invaſion of his dominions, could enable him to form no ſanguine hope of public credit; he turned his eyes towards the city of Hamburgh, which had grown rich by its induſtry and neutrality during the whole war, and by the number of wealthy individuals who had fled thither for refuge from the calamities, with which all the neighbouring countries had been afflicted.

His Daniſh majeſty had always kept alive a claim of ſovereignty over that city, which, however founded, he had taken care to exerciſe whenever he found it convenient. The preſent appeared to him to be one of thoſe conjunctures. Accordingly, without any previous notice, he appears with a ſtrong army before Hamburgh, ſeizes the ſuburbs, and threatens the city with an immediate ſiege, if they did not immediately agree to a loan of one million of rixdollars. The magiſtrates of this trading city, unaccuſtomed to war, unprepared for defence, having no ally at hand, and dreading equally the neighbourhood of an ally, who ſhould be able to protect them, prudently ſubmitted, and furniſhed the king with ſuch a ſupply as his affairs required.

While the king of Denmark took thoſe bold and vigorous meaſures for the defence of his dominions, the affairs of his enemy were running faſt into confuſion. From the moment of the late Czar's acceſſion to the throne of the Ruſſias, ſomething extraordinary was expected. His diſpoſition ſeemed to lead him to make changes in every thing; and having ſet before him two great examples, that of the king of Pruſſia, and of his predeceſſor Peter the firſt, it was apprehended, that this vaſt empire was going once more, almoſt within the life of a man, to aſſume a new face; a circumſtance, which could not fail of having a mighty influence on the affairs of Europe. Peter the third made more new regulations in Ruſſia in a few weeks, than wiſe and cautious princes undertake in a long reign. It was to be feared, that his conduct proceeded rather from a raſh and irregular turn of mind, and a ſpirit of innovation, than from any regular and well-digeſted plan, for the improvement of his extenſive dominions. True it is, his firſt actions, on coming to the throne, were laudable, and ſeemed well calculated to acquire him the affections of his people. But if in ſome inſtances he conſulted their intereſts, in many he ſhocked their prejudices; and he loſt thereby that good opinion of his ſubjects, which is ſo uſeful on all occaſions, but abſolutely neceſſary for carrying ſuch uncommon deſigns as his into execution.

The preference he ſo manifeſtly gave to the uncertain hope of inconſiderable conqueſt, in Holſtein, over the ſolid and valuable poſſeſſions which the fortune of his predeceſſor had left him, muſt have diſguſted all the politicians of his country. His intimate connection with, and boundleſs admiration of that prince, with whom Ruſſia had been, ſo lately, and ſo long, in a ſtate of violent hoſtility, could not add to the opinion of his prudence. They thought he departed from his imperial dignity, in ſoliciting, with ſo much anxiety, a command in the Pruſſian ſervice. When he received it, he dreſſed himſelf in the Pruſſian uniform, made a grand feſtival, and diſplayed all the marks of an immoderate and puerile ſatisfaction. He puſhed his extravagance in this point ſo far, that he made preparations, in this immature ſtate of his government, to quit Ruſſia, and to go into Germany, in order to have an interview with that great monarch, whoſe genius, principles, and fortune, he ſo greatly admired.

Although this proceeding was, almoſt in every reſpect, extremely impolitic, it did not threaten ſuch dangerous conſequences, as the other ſteps which he took about the ſame time. The ſoldiery and the clergy are the great ſupports of all abſolute rule; and they are certainly the laſt bodies, upon which a prince of this kind would chuſe to exert any invidious act of authority. But the Czar was indiſcreet enough, very early in his reign, highly to provoke both thoſe bodies; the ſoldiery, by the manifeſt preference he gave to his Holſtein guards, and to all the officers of that nation; and by the change he made in favour of the Pruſſian uniform to the excluſion of that, in which the Ruſſians believed they had ſo often aſſerted the honour of their country, and gained many ſignal advantages over the troops diſtinguiſhed by thoſe regimentals which were now preferred.

Theſe trifles had very important conſequences; but what he did in matters of religion, was ſtill more dangerous. This prince had been educated a Lutheran; and though he conformed to the Greek church, in order to qualify him for the ſucceſſion, he never ſhewed much reſpect to that mode of religion, to the rules and doctrines of which his ſubjects had been always extremely attached. He ſeized upon the revenues of the eccleſiaſtics, whether monks or ſeculars, whether biſhops or inferiors; and, for compenſation, allowed them ſome mean penſion, in ſuch a proportion as his fancy ſuggeſted. He even ventured to attack the beards of the clergy, which were no longer allowed to grow to their uſual length; an innovation, which, though ſeemingly trifling, was productive of the moſt fatal effects. He made likewiſe ſome regulations concerning the images and pictures in their churches, which gave them reaſon to apprehend his intention of accompliſhing a total change in the ſyſtem of religion, and introducing the doctrines of Luther.

While he was taking theſe meaſures to alienate the minds of his people in general, and eſpecially of thoſe bodies, with whom it was the moſt his intereſt to be well, he had not the good fortune to live in harmony with his own family. He had long ſlighted his conſort, a princeſs of the houſe of Anhalt Zerbſt, a woman of a maſculine temper, bold, politic, ambitious, and vindictive. He maintained an amorous correſpondence with the counteſs of Woronzoff, niece to the chancellor of that name, and ſeemed attached to her with ſo ſtrong a paſſion, as to occaſion a ſuſpicion of his intending to throw his empreſs into a monaſtery, and raiſe this lady to the throne of all the Ruſſias.

What ſeemed to confirm this ſuſpicion, was his omitting formally to declare his ſon, the grand duke Paul Petrowitz, his ſucceſſor. This omiſſion in a country where the ſucceſſion is eſtabliſhed and regular, would have been of no conſequence: the punctual obſervance of ſuch a ceremony would have betrayed ſome doubt of the title. But the nature of this government, as well as poſitive conſtitutions, had made it neceſſary in Ruſſia, and the omiſſion of it was certainly alarming.

That unfortunate prince having, in this manner, affronted his army, irritated his clergy, offended the nobility, and alienated his own family, without having left himſelf any firm ground of authority, in perſonal eſteem, or national prejudices, proceeded with his uſual precipitation to new changes. In the mean time a moſt dangerous conſpiracy was forming againſt him. The cruel puniſhments, inflicted in Ruſſia on ſtate criminals, tend only the more to harden the minds of men already fierce and obdurate, and ſeldom deter them from the moſt deſperate undertakings. Roſamouſki, Hetman or chief of the Coſſacks, a perſon of importance by that command, Panin, governor of the great duke Paul, marſhal Butterlin, the chamberlain Teplow, the attorney-general Glebow, baron Orlow, major of the guards, and many other of the great officers and firſt nobility of the empire, engaged in a conſpiracy to dethrone the Czar, who was now univerſally hated; and what was more fatal to him, univerſally deſpiſed.

They aſſured themſelves that their project could not be diſagreeable to the empreſs; whoſe conduct had always been the very reverſe of that of her conſort. This princeſs, finding that the affections of her huſband were irrecoverably alienated, endeavoured to ſet up a ſeparate and independent intereſt in her own favour, and for aſſerting the rights of her ſon. She therefore aſſiduouſly cultivated the affections of the Ruſſian nation, and paid a reſpect to their manners and religion, in the ſame degree as her huſband ſeemed to contemn both.

So ill was the Czar ſerved, that this conſpiracy was grown general, without his receiving the leaſt notice of it; and he remained in perfect ſecurity, while the ſenate and the clergy were aſſembled to paſs the ſentence of his depoſition. At this time the empreſs and he were both abſent from the capital at different country-ſeats. The empreſs was no ſooner informed that the deſign was ripe for execution, than ſhe got on horſeback, and repaired with all poſſible ſpeed to Peterſburg. She immediately harangued the guards, who cheerfully and unanimouſly declared in her favour, and proclaimed her empreſs of Ruſſia, independently of her huſband. She then addreſſed herſelf to the clergy, and the chief of the nobility, who applauded her reſolution; and all orders immediately took the oath of allegiance to her as ſole empreſs. No ſooner was ſhe acknowledged in this manner, than, without loſing a moment's time, ſhe marched from Peterſburg towards the emperor, at the head of a body of troops.

This prince was indulging himſelf in indolent amuſements, and lulled in the moſt profound ſecurity at a houſe of pleaſure, called Oranienbaum, on the ſea-ſhore, when a ſoldier brought him an account that his kingdom was taken away from him.

Aſtoniſhed, and wholly unprepared for this event, he was ſome time ſenſeleſs, and intirely at a loſs what part to take. When finally arouſed from this trance by the approaching danger, his firſt reſolution was to defend the place with his Holſtein guards; but, though ſatisfied of their attachment, he doubted their ſtrength, and he knew it was in vain to hope for any effort in his favour from the Ruſſians.

Nothing then remained but flight, by which he might eſcape to Holſtein, and wait ſome favourable turn of fortune. This late lord of powerful fleets and armies embarked in a ſmall veſſel, with a few attendants, and rowed towards Cronſtadt; but he had not proceeded very far, when he was informed that this fortreſs was in the hands of his enemies, and that every avenue for eſcape was ſhut againſt him. Dejected and deſponding, he returned to Oraniebaum. After ſome ſhort and tumultuous deliberation, he reſolved to abandon all thoughts of defence, and to throw himſelf on the compaſſion of the empreſs.

On her march ſhe met his meſſengers, who brought letters containing a renunciation of the empire, and ſtipulating no other terms than leave to return to Holſtein, and the ſatisfaction of taking with him, as the companions of his retreat, the counteſs of Woronzoff and one ſingle friend.

Reaſons of ſtate could not permit the empreſs to conſent to the firſt of thoſe terms; and the laſt ſhe conſidered as an inſult on her honour. His terms were rejected; and he was required to ſign an unconditional reſignation of his crown, according to a form that was prepared for him. Not ſatisfied with depriving him of his crown, they even reſolved to make him the murderer of his own reputation; and this unfortunate prince, moved with the vain hope of life, ſigned a paper, declaring his conviction of his inability to govern the empire, either as a ſovereign, or in any other capacity, and his ſenſe of the diſtreſs, in which his continuing at the head of affairs would inevitably involve it. After he had ſigned this abdication, he gave up his ſword, and was conducted to priſon, where, in a ſhort time, but according to what had been univerſally expected, he died. The diſorder, which killed him, was called an hemorrhoidal cholic.

Thus was a revolution of ſuch immenſe importance effected in a ſingle day, and without ſhedding a ſingle drop of blood. The unfortunate emperor enjoyed the power of which he had made ſo imprudent and impolitic an uſe, no longer than ſix months. His conſort, without any hereditary title, is ſovereign miſtreſs of the Ruſſian empire; and the moſt abſolute power on earth is now held by an elective monarch.

Immediately after this revolution a number of manifeſtoes appeared, in which the conduct of the late emperor was condemned, the weakneſs of his perſonal character expoſed, and deſigns of the blackeſt nature, even that of murdering his conſort, attributed to him. Theſe manifeſtoes were at the ſame replete with the ſtrongeſt declarations of affection from the empreſs to the people of Ruſſia, of regard to their intereſts, and of attachment to their religion; and they were all filled with ſuch unaffected and fervent ſtrains of piety, as muſt have been extremely edifying to thoſe who were were acquainted with the religious diſpoſition of the empreſs, her moderate and unambitious temper, and particularly her innocence as to the death of her huſband, which, yet, the malicious and incredulous part of the world obſtinately perſiſted in laying to her charge.

Whatever truth there might be in theſe ſurmiſes, certain it is, that nothing could be more prudent and circumſpect than the conduct of the empreſs. In almoſt every reſpect it was the very reverſe of that of her huſband. She diſmiſſed all foreigners from her confidence and ſervice; ſhe ſent away the Holſtein guards, and choſe Ruſſian, whoſe ancient uniform was revived with new luſtre, the empreſs herſelf frequently condeſcending to appear in it. The clergy were reſtored to the poſſeſſion of their revenues and their beards. She conferred all the great poſts of the empire on native Ruſſians, and entirely threw herſelf on the affections of that people, to whom ſhe owed her elevation.

This great change in the government of Ruſſia, it was univerſally feared, would be followed by a total change of ſyſtem with regard to foreign affairs. The peace and alliance with the king of Pruſſia were very unpopular meaſures in Muſcovy; nor was it probable that the cloſe and intimate connection, which had ſubſiſted between that prince and the late Czar, would greatly recommend him to the ſucceſſor. And as it was imagined, that this revolution muſt have been, in a great degree, owing to the machinations of thoſe courts, whom the Czar had provoked by withdrawing from their alliance, there was the greater reaſon to apprehend, that the power, which was now ſet up, would be exerted in their favour.

There were alſo great advantages on the ſide of Ruſſia, if the empreſs ſhould not hold the peace, concluded by her late huſband, to be binding on her, as none of the conqueſts were at this time evacuated. In a word, every thing ſeemed to conſpire towards replunging the king of Pruſſia into the abyſs of his former diſtreſſes, after he had emerged from them only for ſuch a time, and in ſuch a manner, as to make the renewal of them more bitter and inſupportable.

Fortunately, however, for this wonderful man, the empreſs, who had come to the Ruſſian throne in the manner we have related, could not look upon herſelf as ſufficiently ſecure to undertake again a war of ſo much importance as that which had juſt been concluded. It was neceſſary, for ſome time at leaſt, that ſhe ſhould confine her attention ſolely to her own ſafety. For this purpoſe it was expedient to collect, within itſelf, all the force of the empire, in order to oppoſe it to the deſigns of the many male-contents, with which that empire always abounds, and who, though not attached to the intereſts of the Czar, and little inclined to revenge his fate, would find now both inducement and opportunity for raiſing troubles and attempting new changes. Very plauſible pretences for ſuch attempts exiſted from the time of Peter the Great, who, while he improved and ſtrengthened his kingdom, left in it, at the ſame time, the ſeeds of civil wars and revolutions.

Theſe conſiderations induced the Czarina, however unwillingly, to continue ſo much of the ſyſtem of her predeceſſor, as coincided with her ſituation. She therefore declared to the king of Pruſſia's miniſters, that ſhe was reſolved to obſerve inviolably, in all points, the perpetual peace concluded under the preceding reign; but that, nevertheleſs, ſhe had thought proper to bring back to Ruſſia, by the neareſt roads, all her troops, in Sileſia, Pruſſia, and Pomerania.

This moderation was not owing to the critical ſituation alone of the Czarina: the prudent behaviour of his Pruſſian majeſty, during the time of his connection with the late Czar, contributed likewiſe, in a great meaſure, to reconcile to him the mind of this empreſs, and to perpetuate ſomething like the ſame friendſhip, with intereſts ſo very different. The Ruſſian ſenate, flaming with reſentment againſt this monarch, and againſt their late ſovereign; and the empreſs, full of ſuſpicion, that the conduct of the latter might have been influenced by the councils of the former, ſearched, eagerly, among the papers of the late emperor, for elucidation or proofs of this point. They found, indeed, many letters from the king of Pruſſia; but in a ſtrain abſolutely different from what they apprehended. The king of Pruſſia had, as far as prudence would admit, kept a reſerve and diſtance in regard to the raſh advances of this unhappy ally. Too experienced to be carried away by his inconſiderate impetuoſity, he gave him much ſalutary, though fruitleſs, advice. He counſelled him to undertake nothing againſt the empreſs his conſort; to deſiſt from the war with Denmark; to attempt no changes in the religion and fundamental laws of the country; and to lay aſide all thoughts of coming into Germany.

On hearing theſe letters read, the empreſs is ſaid to have burſt into tears of gratitude, and made, in conſequence, the ſtrongeſt declarations in favour of this prince. Nor were they without effect. Orders had been given with relation to Pruſſia, which threatened a renewal of hoſtilities; but theſe were ſoon countermanded. The army of the Ruſſians was, indeed, ſeparated from that of Pruſſia; but all the important places, which the Ruſſians had, with ſo much bloodſhed, and through ſo many difficulties, acquired, and which gave them the command of every thing elſe that remained to the king, were inſtantly reſtored. An immediate end was likewiſe put to the war between Pruſſia and Denmark; and every thing in relation to Holſtein replaced upon its former footing.

Having thus given a conciſe and, I hope, a faithful account of the revolutions in Ruſſia, I ſhall now proceed to relate the tranſactions of the war as it was carried on in Germany.

In the beginning of the year, the Auſtrian and Pruſſian armies continued very quiet in their winter quarters: but prince Henry, who conducted the troops in Saxony, extended his forces, in January, by driving the Imperial army to a greater diſtance, and occupying Naumberg, Zeits, Altenburg, and Gera. On the other hand, the Imperial and Saxon troops diſlodged the Pruſſians in February, from the poſt of Lamatch, and deſtroyed the magazine which had been tranſported thither from Magdeburg. In the beginning of May, this active prince ſuddenly croſſing the Mulda in three columns, at Roſwin, Dolbeling, and Leiſnig, attacked the left wing of the Imperial and Auſtrian army; on which occaſion, general Zetwitz was taken with twelve officers, fifteen hundred men, and three pieces of cannon. After this exploit, the prince took poſſeſſion of Freyberg, where he found a conſiderable magazine. In the beginning of June, an attempt was made upon his out poſts by the Auſtrians, who had been reinforced for that purpoſe; but they were repulſed with conſiderable loſs.

About the ſame time the king of Pruſſia aſſembled the main body of his army in the neighbourhood of Breſlau; while that of the Auſtrians, under count Daun, occupied ſeveral ſtrong eminences, that enabled him to communicate with Schweidnitz, which was conſidered as the king's chief object.

Towards the latter end of June, the Ruſſian troops under general Czernichew, paſſing the Oder, joined the Pruſſian army, in conſequence of the late treaty between the king and the Czar Peter. Thus reinforced, his majeſty took poſſeſſion of the heights of Sackwitz; and this motion conſtrained count Daun to withdraw in the night to the hills of Kuntzendorff. The king continued to advance, and drove the Auſtrians from ſeveral hills; but his attack upon the hill of Engel, defended by general Brentano, proved ineffectual. Count Daun however, thought proper to decamp from Kuntzendorff, and take poſt at Tanhauſen, in order to ſecure his magazine at Friedland, and maintain his communication with Bohemia, into which the Pruſſian general Weid actually penetrated with a detachment, as far as Weiſſe. Marſhal Daun no ſooner abandoned the hills of Kuntzendorff, than they, together with the heights of Zieſken and Juſtenſtein, were occupied by the Pruſſian forces. In the midſt of theſe tranſactions, many ſkirmiſhes were fought with various ſucceſs, by detached parties, which traverſed the open country in Auſtria, Sileſia, and Moravia, as well as in Bohemia.

The king of Pruſſia did not long enjoy the aſſiſtance of his new allies. The revolution in Ruſſia was no ſooner effected, than orders arrived in the allied camp from Peterſburgh for the Ruſſians to ſeparate themſelves from his army, and return immediately to their own country. The king, without being confounded by this ſudden event, and inſtead of ſlackening his efforts on account of this deſertion, reſolved to fall with vigour, and without delay, upon mareſchal Daun, and to attack him before the news of this change could reach him. Since he could no longer profit by the arms of the Ruſſians, he endeavoured to profit at leaſt by their appearance in his camp. The very next day, therefore, he attacked the Auſtrian army, whoſe right wing occupied the heights of Buckerſdorff, drove them from that eminence, and from ſome villages where they were advantageouſly poſted. The ſucceſs was not owing only to the ſpirit of the actual attack, but to an apprehenſion of the Auſtrians, that the whole united army of the Pruſſians and Muſcovites was on the point of engaging them. The king of Pruſſia made an uſe of thoſe allies, in the moment they deſerted him.

This lively attack was made with the loſs of only three hundred men on the ſide of the Pruſſians: the number of the Auſtrians killed is not known. The priſoners amounted to one thouſand: and fourteen pieces of cannon were taken. It was indeed no more than an affair of poſts; but its conſequences were important; for the communication of the Imperialiſts with Schweidnitz was now entirely and finally cut off: they could not attempt any thing conſiderable for the relief of that place. Prince Henry held them in continual alarm for Bohemia; and a great part of their attention, and no ſmall part of their forces, were kept conſtantly engaged on that ſide. The king of Pruſſia, having thus puſhed back mareſchal Daun, inveſted Schweidnitz, and laid ſiege to that important fortreſs before his face. In the night between the ſeventh and eighth of Auguſt, the trenches were opened, and the operations of the ſiege carried on with ſuch vigour, that by the fourteenth, nine batteries played againſt the town. Schweidnitz was undoubtedly ſtrong, both by nature and art, and moreover defended by a garriſon of nine thouſand men, who exerted themſelves with courage and activity: but ſuch was the determined reſolution of the beſieger, and ſo formidable was the proviſion he had made for this enterprize, that the Auſtrian general thought it neceſſary to make ſome bold attempt to diſturb him in his operations. The Pruſſian infantry were encamped on the heights behind Schweidnitz. The cavalry formed a chain in the plains of Keintzerdorff, extending to a detached corps, under the prince of Wirtemberg, ſo ſituated as to prevent any interruption from the county of Glatz; and the prince of Bevern commanded a ſtrong body advantageouſly poſted near Caſſel.

Theſe diſpoſitions were made to protect the convoys as well as to fruſtrate any attempts which might be made for the relief of Schweidnitz. On the ſixteenth day of Auguſt, the Auſtrian generals Laudohn, O'Donnel, and Beck, were detached with thirty-three battalions, and eighteen regiments of cavalry, to attack the poſt of the prince of Bevern, and they executed their orders with great celerity and reſolution: but the prince, being upon his guard, maintained his ground without flinching, until the king arrived in perſon, with eight battalions of infantry, and a ſtrong body of dragoons and huſſars. Theſe falling upon the Auſtrian cavalry, ſoon routed them with conſiderable ſlaughter, upon which Laudohn deſiſted from his attack, and retreated towards Silberberg, with the loſs of two thouſand men killed or taken by the enemy,

After this victory the king returned to the ſiege, which he proſecuted with redoubled vigour; while general Guaſco, who commanded the garriſon, with the aſſiſtance of two able engineers, left no ſtep untaken which could retard his progreſs. Repeated ſallies were made with conſiderable effect; mines were ſprung, breaches repaired, and the fire from the ramparts was maintained with great ſpirit and perſeverance. Count Daun found it impracticable to take any effectual meaſures for the relief of this fortreſs; yet in Saxony, the Imperial and Auſtrian troops under general Haddick, by three ſucceſſive attacks upon the Pruſſian poſts, compelled prince Henry to abandon Zwickau, Chemnitz, and Wilſdruff. Encouraged by this gleam of ſucceſs, he made an attempt upon the front of the prince's army; but met with a ſevere repulſe.

In the night, between the eighth and ninth of October, the beſiegers of Schweidnitz ſprung a mine; in conſequence of which, great part of the wall was thrown into the ditch, and a diſpoſition was was made for a general aſſault. In this emergency general Guaſco, conſidering it would be madneſs any longer to think of reſiſtance, ordered the chamade to be beat, and ſurrendered himſelf and his garriſon, to the number of eight thouſand men, priſoners of war. This ſiege is ſaid to have laſted the longer, as the attack was conducted, and the defence made, by two engineers, who had written on the attack and defence of places; and they were now practically engaged to prove the ſuperiority of their ſeveral ſyſtems.

The king, having taken poſſeſſion of this fortreſs, which had four times changed maſters ſince the commencement of the war, ſent a ſtrong reinforcement to his brother in Saxony, and returned to his former quarters at Peterſwald. Before this reinforcement arrived, the prince of Stolberg and general Haddick attacked the Pruſſian general Belling, who was poſted in the wood of Rats, from whence he was diſlodged after two ſucceſſive actions, in which a great number were ſlain on both ſides. The Pruſſians, after a moſt obſtinate defence, were not only driven from the wood, but alſo compelled to abandon Freyberg, with the loſs of nine pieces of cannon, ſeven colours, a conſiderable quantity of ſtores, and about a thouſand men taken priſoners, excluſive of thoſe who were killed in the action. The victors having taken poſſeſſion of Freyberg, general Haddick repaired to Dreſden.

Their triumph was of no long continuance. On the twenty-ninth day of October, prince Henry of Pruſſia, even before the arrival of the reinforcement from Sileſia, attacked the Imperial and Auſtrian forces under the command of prince Stolberg. The action began at day-break, and laſted till two in the afternoon, when the enemy being thrown into irreparable diſorder, abandoned the field of battle and the town of Freyberg, with the loſs of five thouſand priſoners, thirty cannon, and many colours and ſtandards. They withdrew to Plauen, complaining that they were betrayed by the perfidy of a ſuperior officer, who had, during the whole campaign, diſcovered their diſpoſitions to the Pruſſian general. He was at laſt detected by an intercepted letter, directed to general Kleiſt, and conveyed under a ſtrong guard from Dippoldeſwalde to Dreſden. In the beginning of November, the king of Pruſſia joined his brother in Saxony, leaving a ſtrong garriſon in Schweidnitz, under the command of major-general Knoblock, and his army in Sileſia, to the conduct of the prince of Bevern, whoſe camp formed a chain on the mountains from Steinfeiſſendorff to Borſdorff, while part of the cavalry encamped on the plain. General Werner was detached with a ſmall corps into the Upper Sileſia. As for marſhal Daun, he ſent a large detachment into the ſame country, and reinforced the Auſtrian troops in Saxony, he himſelf remaining at Scharffnick, in the county of Glatz. Immediately after the victory at Freyberg, a detachment of Pruſſians, under the command of general Kleiſt, made an incurſion into Bohemia, laying waſte the country to the very gates of Prague, and deſtroyed ſeveral Auſtrian magazines of great value.

The court of Vienna, alarmed by the ſucceſs of this partiſan, was glad to agree to a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities, propoſed by the king of Pruſſia, for the reſpective armies in Sileſia, to continue in force during the winter. This being accordingly concluded, the Auſtrian and Imperial troops retired into their winter quarters, in hope of enjoying ſome repoſe, which, however, was of a very ſhort duration.

General Kleiſt immediately advanced at the head of a ſtrong body of forces into Franconia, where he obliged a great number of men to inliſt in the king's ſervice, and laid the whole country under exorbitant contributions. From the city of Nuremberg alone, they are ſaid to have exacted to the amount of two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling. The king, being reſolved on theſe meaſures, had declared by his miniſter to the diet aſſembled at Ratiſbon, that as all his former remonſtrances to the ſtates of the empire had produced no effect, he was determined to employ more effectual means to make them recall their troops from the Auſtrian army: that he had ordered one body of his forces to enter Franconia; another to take the route of Suabia; and a third to penetrate into Bavaria: that they ſhould every where conduct themſelves according to the exigencies of war: but that the diet of the empire ſhould not be diſturbed. It has been ſuppoſed, that, in theſe incurſions, the Pruſſians raiſed a ſum equal to the annual ſubſidy, which had formerly been paid by Great-Britain to their ſovereign.

In Weſtphalia the war was proſecuted with great ſpirit and activity. The deſign of the enemy was to keep poſſeſſion of Heſſe, and extend their conqueſts into the electorate of Hanover, where they were ſtill maſters of Goettingen, which they had been at great pains and expence to fortify. The buſineſs of prince Ferdinand was to ſtop their progreſs, and if poſſible drive them back to the banks of the Mayne.

In the beginning of March, before the armies began their operations, a detachment of four thouſand men from the French garriſon of Goettingen, made a forced march to the poſts of Gittel and Kahlfeldt, in hope of ſurpriſing the eaſt chain of the allied cantonments; but the troops withdrew from theſe places ſo ſeaſonably, that the enemy could only make a ſmall impreſſion on their rear, and next day returned to their quarters. Immediately after this attempt, the eaſt chain of the allies was ſtrengthened by a reinforcement of three thouſand men, who took poſt at Eimbeck.

In April, general Luckner, a famous Hanoverian partiſan, gained a conſiderable advantage over the marquis de Lortange, who had marched out of Goettingen, at the head of eighteen hundred horſe and two thouſand infantry, to intercept the other in one of his excurſions: but Luckner, being appriſed of his deſign, procured a ſtrong reinforcement of horſe, with which he attacked the marquis unexpectedly, and obliged him to retire into Goettingen with great precipitation and no ſmall loſs. About the ſame time major Witzingerode, commander of the Heſſian huſſars, made a party of French irregulars priſoners at Eichsfeld. In the courſe of the ſame month, the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, at the head of a ſtrong detachment, with a train of artillery, laid ſiege to the caſtle of Arenſberg ſituated on one of the heads of the Roer, which the French had occupied, in order to maintain a communication between their forces on the Rhine, and thoſe they had upon the Weſer. In a few hours after the batteries of the beſiegers began to play, the caſtle was ſet on fire, and the flames raged with ſuch violence, that Monſieur de Mutet, with his garriſon of two hundred and thirty men, were obliged to leap over the walls, and ſurrender at diſcretion. After this exploit, the prince made a progreſs as far as Elvervelt and Solingen, in the neighbourhood of Duſſeldorp, and met with conſiderable ſucceſs in levying recruits and contributions.

The French generals, Soubiſe and d'Etrees, arriving at Franckfort in April, aſſembled their forces in May, on the banks of the Weſer, while the prince of Condé conducted a ſeparate army at Duſſeldorp, on the Lower Rhine. Prince Ferdinand, with the main body of the allies, lay encamped behind the Dymel, to make head againſt the two marſhals; the hereditary prince was poſted with a conſiderable corps, in the biſhopric of Munſter, to obſerve the motions of the prince of Condé; and general Luckner, with a third detachment, encamped near Eimbecke on the Leine, to watch prince Xavier of Saxony, who had taken poſt with a corps de reſerve, between the river Werra and the town of Gottingen. The French camp of the marſhals being ſituated between Graebenſtein and Meinbrexen, prince Ferdinand made a diſpoſition for attacking them on the twenty-fourth day of June; and the plan was immediately put in execution. General Luckner, leaving his Heſſian huſſars to amuſe prince Xavier and conceal his route, ſet out from Hollenſtadt on the twenty-third in the morning, croſſed the Weſer in the evening, and by three o'clock next morning arrived between Mariendorff and Udenhauſen. At four general Sporcken paſſed the Dymel at Sielem, with twelve battalions of Hanoverians, and part of the cavalry of the left wing, and advanced between Nombrexen and Udenhauſen, with a view to fall upon the enemy's flank at Carlſdorff, while Luckner ſhould attack them in the rear. At the ſame time prince Ferdinand, paſſing the river with twelve Britiſh battalions, eleven of the Brunſwick troops, eight regiments of Heſſians, with the Engliſh cavalry, and part of the German horſe of the left wing, drew them up, in order, behind the ponds of Kalſe. The vanguard on the left was compoſed of the piquets of the army, and that on the right of the chaſſeurs of the Engliſh and German infantry, commanded by lord Frederick Cavendiſh, and Freytag's Hanoverian chaſſeurs, who had orders to occupy the mountain of Langenberg. The marquis of Granby, who conducted the body of the reſerve, croſſed the Dymel at Warburg, and proceeded by Zieremberg and Zieberſhauſen, to an eminence oppoſite to Furſtenwalde, in order to fall upon the left wing of the enemy. Theſe preparations were made with ſo much judgment, celerity, and good order, that the French had not perceived the approach of the allies, when they found themſelves attacked with infinite impetuoſity in front, flank, and rear. Confounded at this unexpected aſſault, they thought of nothing but a retreat, which they immediately began, and which, conſidering the ardour with which they were attacked, would in all probability have ended in a total rout, had not Mr. de Stainville, at the head of a choſen body, ſacrificed them to the ſafety of the army. This gallant officer threw himſelf into the woods of Willemſtahl, with the grenadiers of France, the royal grenadiers, the regiment of Aquitaine, and ſome other troops that conſtituted the flower of the French infantry. With theſe he made a noble ſtand, effectually covering the retreat of the mareſchals, who retired under the cannon of Caſſel, and part of their forces paſſed the Fulda in the utmoſt precipitation. Lord Granby attacked the troops of Stainville with his uſual impetuoſity; and the whole body was either killed or taken, except two battalions that found means to eſcape. Upon this occaſion the number of priſoners amounted to two thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty, including one hundred and ſixty-two officers, together with ſome ſtandards and colours; while the loſs of the victors did not exceed three hundred men, and no Britiſh officer of diſtinction loſt his life, except colonel Townſhend, who had behaved with great gallantry in this and ſeveral other actions ſince the commencement of the war.

Every thing in the conduct of prince Ferdinand appears the effect of a well digeſted plan; and one great action completed always helps to diſcloſe a ſeries of bold, maſterly, and connected deſigns.

While the French army lay in their ſtrong camp, under the cannon of Caſſel, prince Ferdinand determined, if poſſible, to cut off their communication with Franckfort, which was at preſent preſerved by Mr. de Rochambeau, who had occupied a ſtrong poſt near Homburg, with a body of horſe and ſome brigades of infantry. The marquis of Granby and lord Frederick Cavendiſh advanced to diſlodge him at the head of the Britiſh grenadiers, two regiments of Engliſh cavalry, four Hanoverian ſquadrons, the chaſſeurs of the infantry, and the huſſars of Bauer and Riedeſel. The enemy beginning to retreat as they approached, the marquis ordered his horſe to attack their rear, and this ſervice was gallantly performed by the regiment of blues and Elliot's dragoons, led on by the colonels Hervey and Erſkine: but the French cavalry ſuddenly facing about, and falling upon them ſword in hand, with great reſolution, they muſt have been overpowered by ſuperior numbers, had not the infantry come up to their aſſiſtance. Then the French cavalry retired, and were hard preſſed by the Britiſh grenadiers and Highlanders; ſo that they muſt have been entirely routed, had not they been ſupported by their infantry, which had taken poſt in a hollow way. At length they accompliſhed their retreat, with the loſs of about four hundred men; while the huſſars of Bauer and Riedeſel, advancing to Rothemburg, ſet fire to a conſiderable magazine which the enemy had there collected.

In the month of July, prince Ferdinand formed a deſign of attacking the French mareſchals in their camp at Melſungen, to which place they had withdrawn in order to maintain their communication with Franckfort, and to facilitate their junction with the prince de Condé, who had orders to advance from the Lower Rhine for that purpoſe. The general of the allied army, having made an excellent diſpoſition for attacking the enemy, croſſed the Eder on the twenty-fifth, and joined the marquis of Granby on the heights of Falkenberg; but examining the ſituation of the enemy, he found them too advantageouſly poſted to to attack them with any proſpect of ſucceſs. Obſerving, however, that there were ſigns of confuſion among them, he advanced in columns, and forming at eight in the evening, began to cannonade their camp. At night he retired and repaſſed the rivers Schwalm and Eder, leaving the marquis on the heights of Falkenberg. At the ſame time the enemy croſſed the Fulda, and leaving a body of troops under Mr. de Guerchy, oppoſite to the camp which they abandoned, they withdrew towards Caſſel, while the marquis of Granby took poſſeſſion of the poſt of Melſungen. Thus their communication with Frankfort ſeemed to be once more cut off. Their conduct at this period appears to have been equally imprudent and irreſolute. They ſuſtained a new check in the misfortune of Mr. de Stainville, who, advancing with four regiments of dragoons towards Rothenburn, fell into an ambuſcade at Morſchen, where his troops were routed and diſperſed by a body of troops, under the command of general Freytag. They now relinquiſhed Goettingen, after having deſtroyed the fortifications of the place, which they themſelves had erected at a very great expence. They ſent repeated orders to the prince of Condé, to join them without delay; and, in the mean time, ſecured themſelves in a ſtrong camp on the banks of the Fulda; while prince Ferdinand laid bridges over that river, as if he intended to ſeize the firſt opportunity of hazarding another battle.

On the ſixteenth of July, the prince of Condé began his march from Coesfeldt, in order to join the mareſchals, and paſſed the Lippe at Halteren; but was obliged to take a large circuit, in which he was conſtantly followed by the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, at the head of a ſtrong body detached from the allied army.

On the thirtieth day of Auguſt, being informed that a large body of the enemy were on their march to join the prince of Condé on the heights of Joanneſberg, he determined to attack him before the junction could be effected. At firſt his ſucceſs was anſwerable to his own expectations, and the courage of his troops. He drove the enemy entirely from the high grounds into the plain; but while he purſued his advantage, the body he attacked was reinforced by the main army. The action, which began ſo favourably for the allies, ended in a defeat. They loſt about three thouſand men in killed, wounded, and priſoners. The hereditary prince, who had, through the whole action, made the moſt powerful efforts, and expoſed himſelf to the greateſt dangers, received a wound from a muſket-ball in his hip-bone, from which his life was, for a long time, doubtful, and his recovery lingering and tedious. Whilſt his life continued in danger, the concern was univerſal, and common to both armies; both taking an intereſt in the preſervation of a prince, as much endeared by his humanity, as admired for his valour and military genius.

A victory of the greateſt importance could not have more fully diſplayed the ſuperiority of prince Ferdinand's capacity, in the conduct of a war, than his meaſures after this defeat. The French were not ſuffered to derive the ſmalleſt advantage from their victory; nor did the allies loſe a foot of ground.

As prince Ferdinand ſeemed to have a deſign upon Caſſel, where the French mareſchals had left general Dieſbach with a numerous garriſon; the prince of Condé attempted to open march-routes towards Frankberg, on the Eder, through which he intended to turn the right of the allied army, paſſing by the country of Waldeck. Through theſe very roads prince Ferdinand advanced to Wetter, which was abandoned by the French garriſon, and the prince of Condé was obliged to paſs the Lahne. Then the allied army proceeded to the Ohme, and took poſſeſſion of the camp at Kirchayne, extending to Erneſthauſen, while general Luckner occupied Frankenberg on the Upper Eder. The French mareſchals having endeavoured, in vain, to interrupt his march, between Horloff and Ohme, croſſed the Lahne in the neighbourhood of Gieſſen, and encamped near Marburgh: the prince of Condé took poſt at Groſeln and general Levis at Wetter: but this laſt was diſlodged, and his place occupied by a detachment under the generals Luckner and Conway. Many poſts were diſputed on both ſides with uncommon reſolution. The general of the allies had determined to undertake the ſiege of Caſſel; and the enemy made repeated efforts to throw freſh ſupplies into the place; but they were effectually prevented by the diſpoſition of his forces.

Part of the French army, under the generals de Caſtries and Saarsfeldt, was poſted on one ſide of the Ohme; and on the other, oppoſite to them, was a ſtrong detachment of the allies, commanded by the marquis of Granby and general Zaltrow, in the neighbourhood of the caſtle of Amenebourg, which the allies furniſhed with a garriſon of about ſeven hundred men, under the conduct of captain Cruſe. The enemy reſolved to make themſelves maſters of this fortreſs; and in order to amuſe the allies, attacked a poſt which they occupied at the Brucker-muhl, for the defence of a bridge over the Ohme. It was defended by a detachment of two hundred men, the greateſt part of whom were poſted in a ſmall redoubt they had raiſed for the purpoſe. On the twenty firſt day of September, about ſix in the morning, the weather being extremely foggy, the enemy attacked the poſt at the Brucker-muhl with muſquetry and ſome pieces of cannon, having ſtationed a body of horſe and infantry on the eminence beyond the bridge. A cannonade immediately began on both ſides, while a warm diſpute with ſmall arms was maintained between the aſſailants and the Hanoverians, who defended the redoubt. General Waldegrave, being ordered to ſuſtain this party at the Brucker-muhl, detached the firſt battalion of Britiſh guards to relieve the Hanoverians, who had by this time ſuffered great loſs, and expended all their ammunition. The enemy continuing to throw freſh troops into a ſmall work, which they had beyond the bridge, and to bring up more cannon; prince Ferdinand alſo reinforced his artillery with ſix large cannon, and three howitzers from the army; and four Heſſian battalions advanced to ſupport thoſe who were engaged. Both ſides fought with the moſt determined reſolution, and a prodigious fire of artillery and ſmall arms was maintained for fifteen hours, without intermiſſion; yet no attempt was made on either ſide to paſs the bridge. At length the darkneſs put an end to the action, which coſt the allies about

ſix hundred men in killed and wounded. The loſs of the enemy was much more conſiderable.

They likewiſe began to detach ſome parties on the right and left of the allied army, in order to open their communication with Caſſel; but all their efforts were rendered ineffectual by the vigilance and activity of the allied generals, who obtained ſeveral advantages over them, between the twenty-ſeventh of September and the firſt day of October, when prince Ferdinand's quarters were ſtill at Kirchayn, his army extending on the right to Watzenbach, and on the left, behind Merlan. The marſhals of France had their right at Merlan, and their left at Caldern. This was the period at which the ſiege of Caſſel was undertaken. The trenches were opened on the ſixteenth day of October; and the operations proſecuted with ſuch vigour, that, notwithſtanding the activity and reſolution of a very numerous garriſon, commanded by the baron de Dieſbach, they were obliged to capitulate on the firſt day of November, and marched out with all the honours of war. Prince Ferdinand intended to have finiſhed his operations with the ſiege of Ziegenhayn, which was the only place in Heſſe now poſſeſſed by a French garriſon; but his preparations were interrupted by the ceſſation of arms, which took place immediately after the ſigning of the preliminaries of the peace between France and Great Britain.

This campaign, though not diſtinguiſhed by any great deciſive victory, was not leſs honourable, than any of the former, to the commander or the troops. A connected ſeries of judicious and ſpirited operations produced all the effects which could have been propoſed from a ſingle and brilliant ſtroke. At this time, the French, after having, for ſix years, exerted almoſt the whole undivided ſtrength of their monarchy upon this ſingle object, were, in the end, very little more advanced, than they were the day they firſt ſet their foot in Germany. The poſſeſſion of three or four poor unimportant places was all they had purchaſed by many millions of treaſure expended, and poſſibly near two hundred thouſand lives thrown away. The whole body of the allies acquired great and juſt glory in this war; but the Engliſh had all along the poſt of honour, and obtained the higheſt reputation. As to their commander, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, having begun his operations almoſt without an army, having continued the war with an army always inferior in numbers, having experienced every variety of fortune, his capacity and his firmneſs carried him with credit through all; and enabled him to conclude the war with a triumphant ſuperiority. He may now enjoy, in the honourable repoſe, which his exploits have purchaſed for himſelf and his country, the beſt of rewards, the conſciouſneſs of having merited and obtained the approbation of the public. Poſterity will conſider him as the deliverer of Germany.

Having now concluded the account of the tranſactions of the war on the continent of Europe, I ſhall next deſcribe the exploits of the Britiſh arms by ſea, during the courſe of the year.

In the month of December of laſt year, an unſucceſsful attempt was made by the enemy, to burn the Britiſh ſhips of war at anchor in the road of Baſque. They provided three fire-veſſels, which being chained together, were towed out of the port, but the wind luckily ſhifting, drove them clear off the ſhips they were intended to deſtroy. They continued burning ſome time, after having blown up with a terrible exploſion, and every perſon on board periſhed.

In the beginning of April, captain Gambier, commander of the Burford, arrived at Plymouth with a large French Eaſt-India ſhip from the iſle of Bourbon, laden with coffee and pepper, which had been taken by one of Sir George Pococke's ſquadron, in the Chops of the Channel.

In May, two Britiſh frigates, cruiſing off Cape St. Vincent, made prize of the Hermione, a Spaniſh regiſter-ſhip, bound from Lima to Cadiz, loaded with treaſure and valuable effects, by which all the captors were enriched. Her cargo amounted to about one million ſterling, which was conſiderably more than had ever been before taken in any one bottom; and the loſs of ſo much treaſure in the beginning of ſuch an expenſive war, muſt have been a ſevere ſtroke on the court of Madrid. The prize was brought from Gibraltar to England, and the gold and ſilver being conveyed in covered waggons to London, was carried in proceſſion to the Bank amidſt the acclamations of the people, who conſidered it as an happy omen of ſucceſs in the war with Spain, againſt which the nation was enraged to a remarkable degree of animoſity.

About the latter end of May, intelligence being received that a French ſquadron under the command of Mr. de Ternay had eſcaped from Breſt in a fog, and its deſtination being uncertain, Sir Edward Hawke, with the duke of York, as rear-admiral, ſailed from Spithead with ſeven ſhips of the line, and two frigates, in hopes of falling in with the enemy; but, after having viſited the coaſt of France, and cruiſed for ſome time in the Chops of the Channel for the protection of the trade, they returned to Portſmouth, without having ſeen Mr. de Ternay. He had been diſcovered however, on the eleventh day of May, about fifty leagues to the ſouth-weſt of the Lizard, by captain Rowley, who had ſailed with three ſhips of war as convoy to a fleet of merchant-ſhips bound to the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, and the continent of America. Captain Rowley, though inferior in ſtrength to the enemy, no ſooner obſerved them to windward, than he made a diſpoſition for battle, and lay to, waiting their approach. They accordingly bore down upon him: then he hoiſted Britiſh colours, and fired at the neareſt, when ſhe was within little more than random ſhot. They immediately hoiſted Engliſh enſigns, and tacked to the northward. He gave them chace till three in the afternoon, when they were ſcarcely in ſight; but having no hope of overtaking them, he now diſcontinued the purſuit and rejoined his convoy.

The French commander ſteered his courſe to Newfoundland, and, on the twenty-fourth day of June, entered the bay of Bulls, where he landed ſome troops without oppoſition. Having taken poſſeſſion of an inconſiderable ſettlement in that bay, they advanced to the town of St. John's, which being in no condition of defence, was ſurrendered upon capitulation. One company of ſoldiers, which compoſed the garriſon of the fort, were made priſoners of war, together with the officers and crew of his majeſty's ſloop the Gra-mont, which was in the harbour. They alſo took ſeveral other veſſels, demoliſhed many ſtages erected for curing cod, and did conſiderable injury to the Engliſh fiſhers, and ſettlers on different parts of the coaſt. The miniſtry were no ſooner apprized of this trifling loſs, which it was impoſſible either to foreſee or prevent, than they took meaſures for retrieving the damage which the nation had ſuſtained; and this petty triumph of the enemy was of a very ſhort duration. The armament equipped in England for retaking Newfoundland, was rendered unneceſſary by the vigilance and activity of Sir Jeffery Amherſt and lord Colville, who commanded by land and ſea in North-America.

On the thirty-firſt day of Auguſt, the Hunter ſloop of war, one of Admiral Moore's cruiſers, falling in with four Dutch merchant-ſhips in the channel, under convoy of a frigate of thirty-ſix guns, the Engliſh captain prepared to examine the lading of the Dutch veſſels, when the commander of the frigate interpoſing, declared he would not ſuffer any ſuch ſearch to be made. The other inſiſting upon the examination, but being prevented by ſuperior force, made a ſignal to the Diana and Cheſter ſhips of war, which happened to be in ſight, and they advanced accordingly. After ſome expoſtulation, the Dutch captain continuing obſtinate, the Diana fired a gun to bring him to, and he returned a whole broadſide. An engagement immediately enſued, and was maintained with great ſpirit for about fifteen minutes, when the Dutchman thought proper to ſubmit, having loſt his own noſe, and nine or ten men in the action. He was brought into the Downs, together with his convoy, which were found laden with contraband merchandize from Havre to Breſt.

In the beginning of September the Zephyr, a French frigate of thirty-two guns, bound to Newfoundland, with troops, artillery, ſtores, and ammunition, was taken in the Chops of the Channel by the Lion ſhip of war, after an engagement of two hours, in which ſhe had about thirty men killed and wounded.

In the month of November, a French ſhip mounted with twenty cannon, bound from Bourdeaux to Cape Francois, on the iſland of Hiſpaniola, was taken by captain Ruthven, nephew to the earl of Bute, commander of the Terpſichore, after a ſharp action, in which he himſelf was wounded. In the courſe of the ſame month, the Oiſeau, another French frigate of twenty-ſix guns, commanded by the chevalier De Modene, was taken by captain Tonyn of the king's ſhip the Brune, about ſeven leagues from Carthagena The engagement was maintained, for ſome time, with great courage on both ſides; but at length the chevalier was obliged to ſubmit, having loſt about thirty men, including all his officers, except three, who with himſelf were wounded in the action.

A third French frigate, called the Minerve, was wrecked in the harbour of Villa-franca, through the pride, precipitation, and ignorance of her commander. She had, in company with four French ſhips of war, given chace to the Sheerneſs, an Engliſh frigate commanded by captain Clarke, from Gibraltar, who took refuge in the harbour of Villa-franca, and there anchored, the wind blowing high. He was immediately followed by the enemy, when the captain of the Minerve, actuated by an idle ſpirit of vanity and inſolence, reſolved to get between him and the ſhore, and ran his ſhip upon the rocks that formed the eaſtern ſide of the harbour. Being himſelf ignorant of the art of navigation, and ill ſeconded by a crew little acquainted with ſuch emergencies, his ſhip was in a ſhort time daſhed in pieces; and a conſiderable number of his people periſhed, notwithſtanding all the aſſiſtance that could be given him by his conſorts. On this melancholy occaſion captain Clarke, forgetting they were enemies; and that their preſent calamity was the effect of their enmity to him and his country, generouſly followed the dictates of humanity, and exerted his utmoſt endeavours for their relief. He ſent his boats manned to their aſſiſtance, and actually ſaved the lives of the greater part of their company: an inſtance of unbounded benevolence, for which he was thanked in perſon by the French commodore.

About the end of Auguſt, captain Hotham, of the Æolus, chaced two Spaniſh ſhips into the bay of Aviles, in the neighbourhood of Cape Pinas; and on the ſecond day of September, entering the bay, he dropped anchor in ſuch a ſituation, as to bring his guns to bear, not only upon one of the ſhips, but alſo upon a ſmall battery ſituated upon an eminence. After a ſhort conteſt both the battery and ſhip were abandoned; but before captain Hotham could take poſſeſſion of his prize, ſhe ran aground, and bulging, was burned by the captors. She was a large ſhip bound from the Caraccas to Paſſage, laden with hides and cocoa; the other eſcaped in the night. On the eleventh of September, Captain Hotham came up with a French ſquadron, amounting to no leſs than ſeven ſail, between St. Andero and Bilboa, and kept company with them till the ſixteenth, as far to the weſtward as Cape Finiſterre, whence he returned to his ſtation. By a ſloop from Bourdeaux, which he took on the twentieth, he learned that this ſquadron had a body of troops on board for St. Domingo.

The navy of France was by this time reduced to ſuch a ſmall number, that their miniſtry was obliged to ſend reinforcements to their ſettlements abroad, in ſingle ſhips, ſome of which were picked up by the Britiſh cruiſers, particularly one tranſport containing the beſt part of a regiment intended to reinforce their colony of Louiſiana, which had engroſſed their principal attention in America, ever ſince the loſs of Canada.

About the end of September, the duke of York and Sir Charles Hardy ſet ſail once more with a ſmall ſquadron for the bay of Biſcay, in order to intercept the enemy's cruiſers, and protect the ſhipping of Great-Britain on their voyage home from the weſtward, and after a ſhort cruiſe returned to Spithead.

The cruiſers of Great-Britain were no leſs active and ſucceſsful in the ſeas of America. In the beginning of April captain Ourry of the Actæon, in the latitude of Tobago, took a large Spaniſh regiſter ſhip, bound to Lagueira, laden with artillery, ſtores, and ammunition. In September, a fleet of twenty-five French merchant ſhips, richly laden with ſugar, coffee, and indigo, ſet ſail from Cape Francois for Europe, under convoy of four frigates. Five of theſe veſſels were engaged and taken in the night by ſome privateers of New-York and Jamaica. Next day the remaining part fell in with commodore Keppel, who made prize of their whole fleet and convoy, which were carried into the harbour of Port-royal in Jamaica.

I proceed now to the progreſs of the Britiſh arms in the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies. I have already obſerved, that, in the beginning of March, an armament had ſailed from Portſmouth under the command of the earl of Albemarle and Sir George Pocock; and that, according to the general opinion, it was deſtined to act againſt the chief Spaniſh ſettlement on the iſland of Cuba. On the twenty-ſeventh day of May they were joined off Cape Nicholas, on the northermoſt point of Hiſpaniola, by a detachment of the fleet from Martinico, under Sir James Douglas; and, in conſequence of this junction, their whole force amounted to nineteen ſail of the line, eighteen ſmaller ſhips of war, and about one hundred and fifty tranſports, having on board about ten thouſand land forces and marines. A ſupply of four thouſand men had been ordered from New-York, and was expected to join them very near as early as they could be ſuppoſed able to commence their operations.

The admiral, having determined to take the neareſt courſe through the old ſtraits of Bahama, uſed every poſſible precaution, and choſe the moſt ſkilful pilots for conducting the fleet through that difficult and dangerous paſſage, which lies along the north ſide of Cuba. He was favoured with a fair wind and good weather, which enabled him to perform this taſk in about ten days, without accident or danger; and, on the ſixth day of July, he lay to, about five leagues to the eaſtward of the Havanna, after having taken a Spaniſh frigate and a ſtore-ſhip in the paſſage. Having given directions to the maſters of the tranſports, with reſpect to the landing of the forces, and left commodore Keppel to ſuperintend this ſervice, with ſix ſail of the line and ſome frigates, he bore away with the reſt of the fleet, and ran down off the harbour, where he deſcried twelve Spaniſh ſhips of the line, with ſeveral trading veſſels. Next morning he diſpoſed his marines in boats, and made a ſhew of landing about four miles to the weſtward of the Havanna; while the earl of Albemarle landed with the whole army, between the rivers Boca-nao and Coxemar, about ſix miles to the eaſtward of the Moro Caſtle, which was the enemy's chief fortreſs for the defence of the town and harbour. A body of Spaniards appeared on the ſhore; but, ſome ſloops being ordered in to ſcour the beach and the woods with their cannon, the troops not only landed, but alſo paſſed the river Coxemar, without oppoſition. On the tenth, colonel Carleton drove the enemy from a ſmall redoubt on the top of the hill Cavannos, which overlooked the Moro; and there a poſt was eſtabliſhed: at the ſame time, three bomb-veſſels being anchored in ſhore, began to throw ſhells into the town, under cover of the ſhips Stirling Caſtle and Echo. Though this attack of the Engliſh was altogether unexpected, the place being ſtrongly fortified and well ſupplied, preparations were inſtantly made for a vigorous defence, by Don Juan de Prado, governor of the city, and the marquis del Real, commodore of the ſhipping, aſſiſted by the counſels and experience of the viceroy of Peru and the governor of Carthagena, who happened to be at the Havanna, in their way to or from their reſpective governments. By the twelfth, they had ſunk three of their capital ſhips in the mouth of the harbour, ſo as entirely to block up the channel. The admiral ordered four ſhips of the line to cruiſe in the offing; and, with the reſt of his ſquadron, anchored off Chorera river, four miles to the weſtward of the Havanna, where there was plenty of wood and freſh water. Here, at the requeſt of lord Albemarle, he landed eight hundred marines, formed into two battalions, under the majors Campbell and Collins, who encamped on this ſide, and were reinforced from the other ſide by a detachment of twelve hundred men, under the command of colonel Howe. This ſtep was taken in order to ſecure a footing on both quarters of the town, and diſtract the enemy's attention, ſo as to weaken the defence of the Moro, which commanded the town, and againſt which therefore the earl of Albemarle had determined to direct his chief operations. He was encamped in the woods between the river Coxemar and the Moro, leaving a corps at Guanamacoa, under the command of lieutenant-general Elliot, to guard the avenues on that ſide, and preſerve his communication with the country, which, it was hoped, would ſupply the troops with water, vegetables, and freſh proviſion. The attack of the Moro was conducted by major-general Keppel, brother to the earl of Albemarle; and the chief engineer was Mr. Mackellar, who had diſcovered uncommon abilities at the ſiege of Louiſbourg, and on many other occaſions both in this and the laſt war.

Faſcines, ſtores, and artillery, being conveyed from the ſhips with great expedition by the ſeamen, the engineers began to erect batteries of bombs and cannon, while a body of pioneers were employed to cut parallels in the woods, and form a line with faſcines, to protect the guards from the fire of the enemy, which began to be very troubleſome. On the twenty-ninth, about one thouſand choſen men of the enemy, with a detachment of armed negroes and mulattoes, landed in two diviſions to the right and left of the Moro, in order to demoliſh the works of the beſiegers: but they were repulſed by the piquets and advanced poſts, and retreated in great diſorder, with the loſs of two hundred men, killed or taken.

On the firſt day of July, the beſiegers opened two batteries of cannon, ſo that their whole fire now proceeded from twelve battering cannon, ſix large mortars, three ſmall ones, and twenty-ſix royals. The enemy had ſeventeen pieces of artillery, and one mortar, mounted on the front attacked: but their fire was neither ſo vigorouſly plied, nor ſo well directed as that of the aſſailants. Indeed, their attention was this day divided for about three hours, in conſequence of an attack made upon the north-eaſt face, by three ſhips of the line, the Cambridge, Dragon, and Marlborough, commanded by the captains Gooſtrey, Hervey, and Burnet, who maintained a cloſe cannonade, though with little effect: for the Moro was ſituated too high to be much affected by their artillery. Their rigging was conſiderably damaged, and a good number of their men killed, including captain Gooſtrey, who fell in the beginning of the engagement. His place was ſupplied by captain Lindſay

Lindſay of the Trent, a brave officer, who behaved with remarkable gallantry. Captain Campbell, of the Stirling-Caſtle, who had been ordered to lead until the firſt ſhip had been properly placed, did not perform his part according to the directions he had received; and was obliged to quit the ſervice.

About the ſame time, the admiral's cruiſers, who ſcoured the ſea round the whole iſland, brought in the Venganza frigate of twenty-ſix guns, the Marté of eighteen, and a ſchooner, laden with coffee. On the twelfth, Sir James Douglas, who had parted from the admiral immediately after their junction, and ſteered his courſe to Jamaica, in a ſingle ſhip, now arrived off the Havanna, having under his convoy a fleet of merchant ſhips bound for England.

The parapet of Fort Moro was all of maſon-work; the ditch of the front attacked, was ſeventy feet deep from the edge of the counterſcarp, and more than forty feet of that depth ſunk in the rock. The ſoil of the country was ſo thin, that it was with great difficulty the men could cover themſelves in their approaches; and as it was thought neceſſary to carry on the ſiege by ſap, this method might have been found altogether impracticable, had not Sir James Douglas ſupplied the engineers with cotton bags, from ſome ſhips of his convoy, which were partly loaded with this commodity. Mean while, the enemy made ſuch a vigorous defence, that the ſiege was protracted beyond expectation; a conſiderable delay was likewiſe occaſioned by an unlucky accident. On the third day of July, the principal battery of the beſiegers, chiefly conſtructed of timber and faſcines, being dried by the heat of the weather and the continual cannonade, took fire, and the flames raged with ſuch violence, that almoſt the whole work was conſumed.

The beſiegers laboured under many other diſcouragements. Epidemical diſtempers, ſuch as never fail to attack the natives of Britain who viſit thoſe countries, began to make great havock, both in the army and the navy. Theſe were rendered more fatal by the want of neceſſaries and refreſhments. The proviſion was bad; and the troops were ill ſupplied with water. The great number of the ſick rendered the duty more fatiguing to thoſe that were well. In thoſe warm climates, the human body being in a ſtate of relaxation, is incapable of exerting ſuch vigorous efforts as it can make in more northern latitudes: and the men are ſubject to a ſpecies of dejection, which always increaſes the general mortality: this was now augmented by the delay of the troops from North-America, which they had long expected to no purpoſe.

At length, on the ſecond day of Auguſt, the long wiſhed-for reinforcement arrived; and this circumſtance added freſh vigour to the operations of the ſiege. In a few days, the ſeamen and ſoldiers belonging to four of the American tranſports, which had been wrecked in the ſtreights of Bahama, were brought off in five ſloops, detached by the admiral on this ſervice: but, at the ſame time, he received intelligence that five other tranſports, having on board three hundred and fifty ſoldiers, of Anſtruther's regiment, and one hundred and fifty provincial troops, were taken on the twenty-firſt day of July, by a French ſquadron, which fell in with them near the paſſage between Maya Guanna, and the North Caicos. All the reſt of the troops, however, arrived in perfect health.

On the nineteenth of July, the Engliſh made themſelves maſters of the covered way, before the point of the right baſtion, and a new ſap was begun at this lodgement. The only place by which the foot of the wall was acceſſible, happened to be a thin ridge of rock, left at the point of the baſtion, to cover the extremity of the ditch, which would otherwiſe have been open to the ſea. Along this ridge the miners paſſed without cover, to the foot of the wall, where they made a lodgement with little loſs. Mean while, they ſunk a ſhaft without the covered way, in order to form a mine for throwing the counterſcarp into the ditch, ſhould it be found neceſſary to fill it; and continued their former ſap along the glacis. In the night of the twenty-firſt, a ſergeant and twelve men ſcaled the walls by ſurprize; but, the garriſon being alarmed before they could be ſuſtained, they were obliged to retreat with precipitation. Next day, at four in the morning, a ſally was made from the town, by fifteen hundred men, divided into three detachments, who attacked the beſiegers in three different places, while a warm fire was kept up in their favour from the fort of Punta, the weſt baſtion, the lines and flanks of the entrance, and their ſhipping in the harbour. After a warm diſpute, which coſt the Engliſh about fifty men killed or wounded, all their three parties were repulſed, and fled with ſuch precipitation, that a conſiderable number was drowned in the hurry of their retreat. Their loſs amounted to four hundred, killed and taken priſoners. On the thirtieth day of the month, about two in the morning, a floating battery was towed out into the harbour, and fired with grape-ſhot and ſmall arms into the ditch, though without any great moleſtation to the miners; and the cloſe fire of the covering party ſoon obliged the enemy to retire.

This was the laſt effort for the relief of the Moro; which, abandoned as it was by the city, and while an enemy was undermining its walls, held out with a ſullen reſolution, and made no ſort of propoſal to capitulate. The mines at laſt did their buſineſs. A part of the wall was blown up, and fell into the ditch; leaving a breach, which though very narrow and difficult, the general and engineer judged practicable. The Engliſh troops, who were commanded on this moſt dangerous of all ſervices, rejoiced that it was to be the end of labours which were much more grievous to them. They mounted the breach, entered the fort, and formed themſelves with ſo much celerity, and with ſuch a ſurpriſing coolneſs of reſolution, that the enemy, who were drawn up to receive them, and who might have made the aſſault an affair of great bloodſhed, aſtoniſhed at their countenance, fled on all hands. About four hundred men were ſlaughtered on the ſpot, or ran to the water, where they periſhed. Four hundred more threw down their arms, and obtained quarter. The ſecond in command, the marquis de Gonſales, fell, whilſt he was making brave, but ineffectual efforts to animate and rally his people. Don Lewis de Velaſco, the governor, who had hitherto defended the fort with ſuch obſtinate bravery, ſeemed reſolved, in this extremity, to ſhare the ſame fate with with it. He collected an hundred men in an intrenchment he had made round his colours; but ſeeing that all his companions were fled from him, or ſlaughtered about him, diſdaining to fly or call for quarter, he received a mortal wound, and fell, offering his ſword to his conquerors. The Engliſh wept, with pity and admiration, over that unfortunate valour, which had occaſioned them ſo many toilſome hours, and coſt them ſo many lives.

The reduction of the Moro was not immediately followed by the ſurrender of the Havanna; on the contrary, the governor of the place now directed his chief fire againſt the fortreſs which they had loſt; and even ſent down a large ſhip of the line to the entrance of the harbour, from whence ſhe could batter it with more effect. Her efforts, however, proved altogether fruitleſs, and in a few hours ſhe deſiſted from the attack. In the mean time, general Keppel, with the advice of the engineer, reſolved to erect new batteries on the hill of the Cavannos, on the utmoſt point of which the fort ſtands; and a plan was formed for making a new attack to the weſtward of the town. On the tenth of Auguſt, in the morning, the batteries on the Cavannos being finiſhed, the earl of Albemarle, by a meſſage, deſired the governor to ſurrender; and his anſwer was, that he would defend the place to the laſt extremity. Next morning, at day-break, about three and forty cannon and twelve mortars began to play againſt the town and the Punta, which laſt was ſilenced before ten; in another hour the north baſtion was almoſt diſabled. About two in the afternoon, white flags were hung out all round the place, as well as aboard the admiral's ſhip in the harbour; and, in a little time, a flag of truce arrived at the head-quarters, with propoſals of capitulation. The governor ſtickled hard to obtain permiſſion to ſend the ſhips to Spain, and to have the harbour declared neutral; but neither of theſe points could be given up, and hoſtilities were ordered to be renewed, when the enemy thought proper to recede from their demands. By the capitulation, which was ſigned on the thirteenth, the inhabitants were ſecured in their private property, in the enjoyment of their own laws and religion; and next day the Engliſh troops took poſſeſſion of this important conqueſt. As for the Spaniſh garriſon, which was reduced to about ſeven hundred, including officers, they were indulged with the honours of war; and it was ſtipulated, that they and the ſailors ſhould be conveyed to Old Spain, together with the Spaniſh commodore, the governor of the Havanna, the viceroy of Peru, and the governor of Carthagena, which two laſt had not yet left the place. In the progreſs of the ſiege, about five hundred of the Britiſh troops, including fifteen officers, were killed outright or died of their wounds; and about ſeven hundred, comprehending thirty-nine officers, were cut off by a diſtemper, which raged with ſtill greater violence after the reduction of the place. Vaſt quantities of artillery, ſmall arms, ammunition, and warlike ſtores, fell into the hands of the conquerors, together with twelve ſhips of the line, two upon the ſtocks, and ſeveral trading veſſels. They likewiſe acquired to the amount of about three millions ſterling, in ſilver, tobacco, and valuable merchandize, collected on his catholic majeſty's account: ſo that the Britiſh nation was more than indemnified for the expence of the expedition; and the enemy's loſs was irreparable.

So much treaſure intercepted by the Engliſh, firſt in the ſhip Hermione, and now in the iſland of Cuba, muſt have been a ſevere ſtroke upon the king of Spain: but the ruin of his navy was of much greater importance, and even that but a trifle in compariſon to the loſs of the Havanna, the port at which all their galleons and flota, loaded with the riches of Mexico and Peru, rendezvouſed in their return to Old Spain; the port which abſolutely commanded the only paſſage by which their ſhips could ſail from the bay of Mexico to Europe.

So lucrative a conqueſt had never before been made by the Engliſh. But this immenſe capture, though it enriched individuals, contributed nothing directly to the public revenue. It might be ſaid, however, to contribute ſomething to it indirectly; by encreaſing the ſtock of the nation, and ſupplying that prodigious drain of treaſure, which, for ſeveral years, had been made from this kingdom, for foreign ſubſidies, and for the maintenance of armies abroad. If it had not been for ſuch pecuniary ſupplies, with which the uncommon ſucceſſes of this war were attended, it never could have been maintained in the extent to which it was carried, notwithſtanding the encreaſe of trade, which had been uniformly progreſſive for the three preceeding years. It has been, in a looſe way, computed, that the ſucceſs of our arms in the Eaſt-Indies, independent of the great increaſe of valuable merchandize, had brought into England, during the war, near ſix millions in treaſure and jewels. The conqueſt of the Havanna was not the only inſtance in which the arms of Great-Britain triumphed over thoſe of Spain in the courſe of this ſhort war; they were no leſs ſucceſsful in another enterprize in the Eaſt-Indies.

It may not be improper to inform the reader, that the Philippine iſlands, in the Indian ocean, extend from the ſixth to near the twentieth degree of north latitude, about one hundred and twenty leagues to the ſouthward of China; that they are ſuppoſed to be twelve hundred in number, and are conſidered as part of the ſovereignty of Spain; that in the largeſt of them, called Luconia, which is ſaid to be above one hundred and ſixty leagues in length, the Spaniards are poſſeſſed of Manilla, a conſiderable city, extenſive, populous, and tolerably well fortified, the centre of the Spaniſh trade, from whence two large ſhips are ſent annually acroſs the vaſt Pacific ocean to Acapulco, on the coaſt of Mexico, laden with the ſpices, ſtuffs, jewels, and other rich merchandize of India. The city is ſituated on a point of land, formed by a river that iſſues from the great lake of Bahia, and falls into the ſea a little lower, at the town of Cavite, where there is a ſpacious harbour, though the entrance is difficult. The ſuburbs of Manilla are very extenſive, containing a great number of inhabitants, natives of different countries, particularly Chineſe; but the number of the Spaniards within the place does not amount to above five thouſand.

Againſt this ſettlement, a plan of attack was formed at Madraſs, to be carried into execution by part of the ſquadron of vice-admiral Corniſh, and a few battalions under the command of brigadier dier-general Draper, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the defence of Madraſs, when it was beſieged by the enemy. The troops deſtined for this expedition conſiſted of one regiment, with a company of the royal artillery; and to theſe were added, by the governor of Madraſs, ſome able officers, about thirty men of the company's artillery, ſix hundred Sipoys, one company of Caffres, one of Topazes, one of pioneers, two companies of French deſerters, with a few hundred of Laſcars, for the uſe of the engineers and the park of artillery. Vice-admiral Corniſh ſupplied a ſtrong battalion of ſeamen and marines; ſo that the whole force amounted to two thouſand three hundred effective men, with which it was determined to make an attempt upon the flouriſhing city of Manilla.

Major-general Laurence, who conducted the forces of the Eaſt-India company at Madraſs, gave it as his opinion that the ſettlements would be in danger, ſhould a greater number of troops be drawn from the coaſt; and therefore, the two battalions of the company's troops, the whole cavalry, ſix thouſand Sipoys, with part of Monſon's regiment, and the highlanders, were left for their defence: at the ſame time, orders were given, that three ſhips of war, which they hourly expected at Madraſs, ſhould remain on that part of the coaſt for the ſecurity of the commerce. The preparations at length being fully completed, captain Grant, in the Sea-horſe, was inſtantly detached to the entrance of the Chineſe ſea, with inſtructions to intercept all veſſels bound for Manilla, that the enemy might get no information of their deſign.

The forces, with the ſtores and artillery, were no ſooner embarked, than admiral Corniſh ſailed in two diviſions about the beginning of Auguſt, and on the nineteenth arrived at Malacca. Here the fleet being watered, and a large quantity of rattans collected for making gabions, they proſecuted their voyage; and on the twenty-third day of September, anchored in the bay of Manilla, where they found the enemy but ill prepared for a defence, and much alarmed at this unexpected viſit. The governor was the archbiſhop, who aſſumes the title of captain-general of the Philippine Iſlands: but the garriſon, conſiſting of eight hundred men of the royal regiment, was commanded by the marquis de Villa-medina, a brigadier-general, who now reinforced it with a body of ten thouſand Indians, from the province of Pampanga, a fierce and ſavage nation, who, though unacquainted with the uſe of fire-firms, manage their bows and arrows with great dexterity, and are very formidable from their intrepidity and contempt of death.

The admiral, having ſounded the coaſt, diſcovered a convenient place for landing the troops, about two miles to the ſouthward of Manilla. On the twenty-fourth day of September, the proper diſpoſitions being made, and the three frigates, Argo, Sea-horſe, and Seaford, ſtationed very near the ſhore, to cover the deſcent; three diviſions of the forces were put on board the boats of the fleet, conducted by the ſea-captains Parker, Pempenfeldt, and Brereton, and landed at the church and village of Malata, not without ſome difficulty from a great ſurf that rolled on the beach. The enemy began to aſſemble in great numbers, both horſe and infantry, to oppoſe the deſcent; but the captains, King, Grant, and Peighin, who commanded the covering frigates, poured in ſuch a continued fire of cannon and ſmall-arms, that they ſoon diſperſed; and the general diſembarked his troops without the loſs of one man; while the Spaniſh garriſon were employed in burning the ſuburbs of Manilla. Next day the general took poſſeſſion of the Polveriſta, a ſmall fort which the enemy had deſerted, and which proved an excellent place of arms for covering the landing of the ſtores and artillery. Colonel Monſon, the ſecond in command, with an advanced party of two hundred men, occupied the church of the Hermita, about nine hundred yards from the city. The head-quarters were eſtabliſhed in the curate's houſe, and guarded by the ſeventy-ninth regiment, of which Mr Draper himſelf was colonel, as a poſt of the utmoſt conſequence, both from its ſtrength, and the commodious cover it afforded from the rains which had deluged the country, and rendered it impoſſible to form an encampment. The marines were left at the Malata, in the neighbourhood of the Polveriſta, to ſecure the communication with the fleet, and protect the ſtores and artillery, which were not landed without great danger and fatigue. Some boats were overſet, and lieutenant Hardwick periſhed on this occaſion. In the mean time a body of men approached within three hundred yards of the town, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the church of St. Jago, which they maintained, notwithſtanding its being expoſed to the fire of the enemy. The battalion of ſeamen, landing on the twenty-ſixth, were cantoned between the ſeventy ninth regiment and the marines; and the reſt of the company's troops, being diſembarked, were likewiſe put under cover. This day the enemy, to the number of four hundred men, with two field-pieces, under the command of the chevalier Fayette, marched up on the right of the Engliſh advanced poſt, the flank of which they began to cannonade: but colonel Monſon, at the head of the piquets, and a ſmall reinforcement of marines, ſoon repulſed them, and obliged them to retire with ſuch precipitation, that they left one of their field-pieces behind them.

The governor had been already twice ſummoned to ſurrender, but returned a flat refuſal; and, indeed, if the valour of his troops had been equal to the vigour of his declaration, he had but little to fear from an handful of enemies, who, far from being in a condition to inveſt the city on all ſides, were obliged to confine their operations to one corner, leaving two-thirds of it open to all manner of ſupplies. The front, which the general determined to attack, was ſecured by the baſtions of St. Diego and St. Andrew, a ravelin, which covered the royal gate, a wet ditch, a covered way, and a glacis. The baſtions were in good order, furniſhed with a great number of fine braſs cannon: but the ravelin was not armed; nor the covered way in good repair: the glacis was too low, and the ditch was not carried round the capital of the baſtion of St. Diego. The breadth of the ditch was about thirty yards, and the depth of water did not exceed five feet. It was ſounded by a detachment, headed by captain Fletcher, who begged leave to undertake this hazardous enterprize, which he accompliſhed in the midſt of the enemy's fire, with the loſs only of three men.

Some ſtraggling ſeamen having been butchered by the ſavages, the governor ſent out a flag of truce on the twenty-ſeventh, to apologize for theſe barbarities, and beg the releaſe of his own nephew, who had been lately taken in the bay, by the boats of the fleet. He had been diſpatched in a galley, by the commander of the Galleon Philippina, juſt arrived from Acapulco, at Cajayagan, near Cape Spirito Santo, with the firſt advices of the war. Next day, while lieutenant Fryar, with a flag of truce, conducted the priſoner to the town, a detachment of the garriſon, intermixed with Indians, ſallied out to attack one of the poſts of the beſiegers; when the ſavages, without reſpecting the law of nations, or the ſacred character of an officer, under the protection of a flag of truce, fell upon Mr. Fryar, with the moſt inhuman fury, and murdered him on the ſpot. They even mangled his body in the moſt brutal manner, and mortally wounded the Spaniſh gentleman, who endeavoured to protect his conductor. In their attack, they were ſoon repulſed by the Britiſh party that defended the poſt, who were ſo much enraged at their barbarity, that they gave them no quarter.

Mean while ſeveral mortars bombarded the town day and night, without intermiſſion; and the engineers were employed in raiſing ſome batteries to play upon their works. On the twenty-ninth, the admiral, at Mr. Draper's requeſt, ordered the Elizabeth, commodore Tiddeman, and the Falmouth, captain Brereton, to lie as near the town as the depth of water would allow, and enfilade the enemy's front, with a view to ſecond the operations of the beſiegers. They executed this taſk with great intrepidity; and, although the ſhallows kept them at too great a diſtance to anſwer the purpoſe effectually, their fire did not fail to throw the inhabitants into the moſt terrible conſternation. On the firſt and ſecond days of October, the weather was ſo ſtormy as to endanger the whole ſquadron, which lay upon a lee ſhore. The South ſea Caſtle ſtore-ſhip was driven aſhore, and, even in that ſituation, did remarkable ſervice, by enfilading the whole beach to the ſouthward, with her guns, and over-awing a large body of Indians, who threatened an attack on the Polveriſta, and the magazines of the beſiegers at the Malata.

Notwithſtanding the ſtorm and heavy rains, the troops and ſeamen found means to erect batteries of cannon and mortars. They likewiſe drew a parallel and communication from thence to the advanced poſt at the church, and eſtabliſhed a ſpacious place of arms on the left of it, near the ſea, the roaring of which favoured the workmen in the night, by preventing the noiſe they made from being heard by the garriſon. On the third, the battery being opened againſt the left face of St. Diego's baſtion, was ſo well ſerved by the ſeamen and corps of artillery, and the fire ſo well directed by the conduct and ſkill of major Barker, that, in a few hours, twelve pieces of cannon mounted on the face of the baſtion, were totally ſilenced, and the enemy compelled to withdraw. At night, a battery was begun of three guns on the left of the place of arms, to ſilence thoſe that were in barbette, upon the orillon of the St. Andrew baſtion, which annoyed the flank of the beſiegers. A cloſe fire of grape-ſhot and muſquetry was continued all night, to prevent the enemy from repairing their embraſures, and remounting their cannon; while ſeven mortars played without intermiſſion, upon the gorge of the baſtion, and the neighbouring defences.

On the fourth, the cantonment of the ſeamen was attacked three hours before day, by a ſtrong body of Indians, encouraged to this attempt by the inceſſant rains, which, they imagined, had rendered the fire-arms uſeleſs. Their approach was facilitated by a number of thick buſhes growing on the ſide of a rivulet, through which they paſſed in the night, without being obſerved by the patroles. The alarm was no ſooner given, than colonel Monſon and captain Fletcher advanced with the piquets to the aſſiſtance of the ſeamen, who had very judiciouſly kept firm within their poſts, contenting themſelves with acting on the defenſive, until the light ſhould enable them to diſtinguiſh friend from foe. The aſſailants, though armed chiefly with bows and lances, advanced with the moſt determined countenance to the attack; fought with incredible fury; when repulſed, returned with redoubled rage to the very muzzles of the Engliſh muſquets; and died like wild beaſts, gnawing their bayonets. At day-break, a freſh piquet of the ſeventy-ninth regiment appearing upon their right flank, they gave way and fled with great precipitation, having loſt three hundred men in their attack and retreat.

This party was no ſooner repulſed, than another body of them, reinforced by a few of the Spaniſh troops, made a furious aſſault upon the church, part of which they at laſt gained, after having expelled the Sipoys that were there poſted. From the top they fired down among the Engliſh ſoldiers, who, though now expoſed to a continued ſhower of bullets and miſſiles, maintained their poſt behind the church, without flinching; and, after an obſtinate diſpute, diſlodged the enemy, by the aſſiſtance of ſome field-pieces, and the gallant behaviour of major Fell, captain Fletcher, and other officers ſent to their ſuccour. Seventy Spaniards were killed outright; and this, with the former action, coſt the beſiegers about forty men, including captain Strahan of the ſeventy-ninth regiment, and lieutenant Porter of the Norfolk, two gallant officers, who loſt their lives, and fell univerſally lamented.

The enemy, confounded by ſuch a ſevere check, made no further attempts for relieving the place, and the Indians returned to their own habitations. The fire from the garriſon diminiſhed apace; and all their defences appeared to be ruined. On the fifth, the fire of the beſiegers became ſo violent, that a conſiderable breach was effected in the wall; and it was hoped the garriſon would demand a capitulation: but they ſeemed to be obſtinate and ſullen, without courage or activity: they had not taken care to repair their works; and now they neglected all means of procuring favourable terms, without being reſolved to defend the breach; ſo that the Engliſh general made a diſpoſition for ſtorming the town.

On the ſixth, at four o'clock in the morning, the troops allotted for this ſervice, marched off from their quarters, in ſmall bodies, to avoid ſuſpicion, and gradually aſſembling at the church of St. Jago, concealed themſelves in the place of arms, and the parallel between the church and the battery.

battery. Mean while major Barker maintained a close fire upon the works of the enemy, and those places where they might be lodged or intrenched, the mortars co-operating in the same service. At day-break, a large body of Spaniards was seen drawn up on the bastion of St. Andrew, as if they had received information of the intended assault, and had determined to annoy the assailants with musquetry and grape-shot from the extreme flank of the bastion, where they had still two cannon fit for service; but a few shells falling among them, they fled in confusion. The British troops seized this opportunity, and, directed by the signal of a general discharge from the artillery and mortars, advanced to the assault, under cover of the thick smoke which blew directly on the town.

Lieutenant Russel, at the head of sixty volunteers, led the way, being sustained by the grenadiers of the nineteenth regiment, to which he belonged. They were followed by the engineers, with the pioneers, and other workmen, to clear and widen the breach, and make lodgements, in case the enemy should have been found intrenched in the gorge of the bastion, Colonel Monson and major More conducted two grand divisions of the seventy-ninth regiment. The next body that advanced was the battalion of seamen, supported by the other two divisions of the seventy-ninth; and the rear was brought up by the troops of the East-India company. According to colonel Draper's own account, the number of troops with which he entered Manilla amounted to little more than two thousand, composed indifferently of seamen, soldiers, Sipoys, Caffres, Lascars, Topasees, French and German deserters. These assailants mounted the breach with incredible courage and celerity, while the Spaniards on the bastion fled so unexpectedly, that it was strongly suspected they intended to spring mines. The English troops penetrated into the town with very little opposition, except at the royal guard-house, defended by one hundred Spaniards with Indians, who refusing to submit, were instantly cut in pieces. They were likewise considerably galled with shot from the galleries of lofty houses, with which the great square was surrounded. Three hundred of the garrison were drowned in attempting to cross the river, which was deep and rapid; the governor, with the principal magistrates, withdrawing into the citadel. This retreat was in itself imprudent, inasmuch as they took no step towards procuring terms for the citizens, who were accordingly subjected to a severe chastisement.

Colonel Draper, having no offer of capitulation or surrender made him, could not prevent his troops, for some hours, from making the city feel all the rapaciousness of a common soldiery; and those he commanded, except the few regulars, could not be supposed to be of the most orderly kind. At last the citadel, being utterly untenable, the archbishop and the magistrates surrendered themselves prisoners of war, and it was immediately occupied by captain Dupont, with one hundred men of the seventy-ninth regiment. The marquis de Villa-medina, with the rest of the Spanish officers, were enlarged on giving their parole of honour; and all the Indians were dismissed in safety. This important conquest was atchieved with the loss of no more than twenty men, among whom, however, was unfortunately the gallant major More, who fell by an arrow, at the royal gate.

Manilla was no sooner occupied by the British forces, than the admiral went on shore to consult with general Draper on this great event; and to settle a capitulation. This was found on tryal, to be no easy matter. When the archbishop and magistrates appeared, the two English commanders generously acquainted them, they were ready to agree to a capitulation that might save so fine a city from destruction; and desired them to withdraw, to deliberate and propose such terms of compensation as might satisfy the soldiers and sailors, and secure them from pillage and its fatal consequences.

Upon their return they produced a draught of terms, in the name of the archbishop, the royal audience, and the city and commerce of Manilla, which were so little agreeable to their desperate situation, that they were rejected as unsatisfactory and inadmissible, because they made no mention of a compensation to the victors for protecting the place from military execution. The English commanders then took the pen, and prescribed the conditions on which the city of Manilla should be saved from plunder, and the inhabitants secured in their religion, liberties, and properties, under the government of his Britannic majesty. In this paper the British commanders promised that the terms proposed by the archbishop and the magistrates should be granted, if those of the ransom were complied with; to which the Spaniards agreed. In pursuance of this capitulation the town and port of Cavite, with the islands and forts depending upon Manilla, were to be delivered up to his Britannic majesty; and four millions of dollars paid as a ransom for the city of Manilla, and the effects of the inhabitants, who, on the other hand, were to be maintained in their religion and private property, under the government and protection of the king of England. The port and citadel of Cavite were surrendered, together with several large ships, and a vast quantity of warlike and naval stores. The Spanish garrison of three hundred men, instead of quietly submitting themselves agreeable to the governor's order, mutinied against their officers; and, having pillaged some houses, retired with their arms to the country. Captain Campion, with two hundred men, being embarked in the Sea-horse, took possession of the place, and captain Kempenfeldt was constituted governor of it, by a commission from the general. One third of the ransom of Manilla was allowed to the East-India company; and Mr. Draper, according to the instructions he had received, delivered up the city of Manilla, the port of Cavite, with all their artillery, ammunition, and warlike stores, to Dawson Drake, Esq; and the other persons appointed to receive them in behalf of that company. All the British forces employed in this expedition were but barely sufficient to garrison this important conquest, which was obtained with so little bloodshed, that not above one hundred men were killed in the whole service. Among these, however, was unhappily numbered the gallant commodore Tiddeman, who, in attempting to enter the river in his barge, on the morning that succeeded the reduction of the place, was unfortunately drowned with five of his people.

The

The acquiſition of Luconia, with its towns, treaſures, artillery, ſtores, iſlands, and dependencies, was immediately ſucceeded by another advantage of no ſmall importance. Admiral Corniſh having learned by means of ſome letters taken in the galley with the Spaniſh governor's nephew, that the galleon St. Philippina was arrived from Acapulco at Cajayagan, he detached in queſt of her the Panther and Argo, two ſhips of war, commanded by the captains Parker and King; the firſt of the line; the other a frigate. On the thirtieth day of October, being of the iſland Capul, near the entrance of the Embocadero, they diſcovered a ſail ſtanding to the northward. The Argo being driven by the current among the Narangoes, was obliged to anchor: but captain King, in the frigate, coming up with the chace, engaged her for near two hours, during which he was roughly handled, and even compelled to deſiſt, until his rigging could be repaired.

The current ſlackening, captain Parker was enabled to get under ſail; and about nine next morning, came up with the enemy, who, after having been cannonaded two hours at a very ſmall diſtance, ſtruck their colours and ſurrendered: but the captain was not a little ſurpriſed to hear, when the Spaniſh general came on board, that, inſtead of the St. Philippina, he had taken the Santiſſima Trinidad, which had departed from Manilla on the firſt day of Auguſt, bound for Acapulco, and had ſailed three hundred leagues to the eaſtward of the Embocadero; but, meeting with a hard gale of wind, and being diſmaſted, was obliged to put back and refit. She was a very large ſhip, ſo thick in the ſides, that the ſhot of the Panther did not penetrate any part of her, except the upper works. She had eight hundred men on board; and was pierced for ſixty cannon; but no more than thirteen were mounted. The merchandize on board was computed at one million and a half of dollars, and the whole cargo ſuppoſed to be worth double that ſum; ſo that this capture was a conſiderable addition to the conqueſt, and a freſh wound to the enemy.

The news of the recovery of St. John's in Newfoundland, which arrived about this period, was likewiſe another cauſe of triumph in England.

Lord Colville was no ſooner informed of the progreſs which the French armament had made on the coaſt of Newfoundland, than he ſailed thither from Hallifax, and blocked up the harbour of St. John's by ſea, even while Mr. Ternay, the French commodore, lay at anchor in it, with a ſuperior ſquadron. On the eleventh day of September, his lordſhip was reinforced by colonel Amherſt, who had been detached on this ſervice by his brother Sir Jeffery Amherſt, commander of the forces in America. The colonel had touched at Louiſbourg, and taken on board ſome troops, which, with thoſe brought with him at Hallifax, amounted to about eight hundred, chiefly highlanders and light infantry. They diſembarked, after a ſlight oppoſition, in Torbay, about ſeven miles to the northward of St. John's: and this part of the country was extremely encumbered with mountains and paſſes occupied by the enemy. The Britiſh forces advanced to the ſtrong poſt of Kitty-vitty, which they took ſword in hand. They likewiſe diſlodged the enemy from two other heights which they had fortified, and did not abandon till after an obſtinate diſpute. On the ſixteenth of September, they took poſt in the neighbourhood of St. John's Fort, and, next day, a mortar battery was erected. The French commodore had ſunk ſome ſhallops in the entrance of the harbour, which was commanded by a breaſt-work and unfiniſhed battery. Theſe being gained, and the channel opened, colonel Amherſt received his artillery and ſtores, by water-carriage: but lord Colville was driven by contrary winds, to ſome diſtance from the coaſt. In his abſence, Mr. de Ternay, availing himſelf of a thick fog, immediately hoiſted ſail and made his eſcape. His ſhips were deſcried at a great diſtance from the top-maſt heads of the Britiſh ſquadron, ſteering ſouth ſouth-eaſt; but not ſuppoſed to be the ſhips of Mr. Ternay. On the eighteenth, in the morning, Mr. de Hauſſonville, the commander of the French forces at St. John's, who had been ſummoned, and refuſed to ſurrender, thought proper to agree to a capitulation; and delivered himſelf with his garriſon, priſoners of war, on condition of being conveyed to Breſt the firſt opportunity. They were a fine body of troops, very near equal in number to the beſiegers; and lord Colville, who had by this time returned to the harbour, appointed ſome ſhips for tranſporting them to France. Thus the town and fort of St. John's, with all the other petty places which the French had taken on this coaſt, were recovered, with very little loſs, by a handful of troops, who exerted themſelves with equal courage and conduct on this occaſion.

When France had found experimentally, that the preſent at leaſt was not the favourable time, for drawing from her alliance all thoſe advantages, with which ſhe had flattered herſelf, ſhe inclined in good earneſt to peace. The ſincerity of her procedure in the former negociation might juſtly be queſtioned; becauſe ſhe had prepared an after-game in caſe of its proving abortive. And ſo much did ſhe rely on it, that probably the negociation itſelf was but a feint made to cover and to prepare that project. But finding that Great-Britain was neither intimidated by the threats of that formidable alliance, nor at all likely to be reduced by the exertion of its forces, ſhe came, in good earneſt, into thoſe pacific ſentiments, which formerly ſhe had only counterfeited. The ſlow progreſs of the Bourbon troops in Portugal, the retrograde motion of the French army in Germany, the taking of Martinico and its dependencies, the reduction of the Havanna, all conſpired to humble the pride, and daſh the hopes of the Bourbon alliance.

On the ſide of Great-Britain, likewiſe, the diſpoſitions to peace became much more cordial. No people were ever leſs intoxicated with ſucceſſes. Victories were grown familiar to us, and made but little impreſſion. The marks of public joy on the moſt conſiderable conqueſts, were become much ſlighter and colder, than were ſhewn at the beginning of the war, upon any trivial advantages. Though her trade had been greatly augmented, a circumſtance beyond all example favourable; and though many of her conqueſts, as we have ſeen, were attended with the moſt ſolid advantages, her ſupplies of money, great as they were, did not keep pace with her expences. The ſupply of men too, which was neceſſary to anſwer the waſte of ſo extenſive a war, became ſenſibly diminiſhed; and the the troops were not recruited but with ſome difficulty, and at a heavy charge. It was time to cloſe the war, when every end, we could rationally propoſe to ourſelves in carrying it on, was attained. We had enough to anſwer all our demands, and almoſt all our expectations; and as it is grown into a ſort of maxim, that nations greatly victorious muſt cede ſomething on a peace, the difficulty on our ſide was only what, and how much we ſhould retain. Not that there was a doubt, but whatever choice of acquiſition could be made upon any rational principles, a great deal would ſtill remain to give the fulleſt ſcope to every ſentiment of equity and moderation.

Theſe cauſes co-operated to render the deſires of the Britiſh miniſtry towards peace, altogether hearty and ſincere; and they thought themſelves abundantly juſtified in their wiſhes for it at this juncture, both by the ſucceſſes and burthens of the nation; from the flouriſhing ſtate of ſome of their allies, and the doubtful ſtate of others; and, in general, from thoſe arguments of humanity, which made it high time, that Europe ſhould enjoy ſome interval of repoſe.

Both courts thus concurring in the ſame point, all difficulties were ſpeedily ſmoothed. It is ſaid that the firſt overtures were made under the mediation of his Sardinian majeſty. As ſoon as terms were propoſed, a reſolution was taken, in order to give to each other a pledge of their mutual ſincerity, that this treaty ſhould not be negociated, as the former had been, by ſubordinate perſons; but that the two courts ſhould reciprocally ſend, to London and Verſailles, a perſon of the firſt conſequence and diſtinction in either kingdom. Accordingly, the duke of Bedford was ſent to negociate on the part of England; and the duke de Nivernois on that of France; and the great outlines of the treaty were very ſoon explained and adjuſted. In the negociation of 1761, it had been laid down as a principle by the two courts, that their reſpective propoſitions, in caſe the treaty ſhould, by any accident, be broken off, were to be conſidered as retracted or never made. Theſe propoſitions however, notwithſtanding the above ſalvo, ſtill continued in force, and were aſſumed as the baſis of the preſent treaty, which differed, in no eſſential point, from the former. The ſpirit of the two negociations, ſo far as regarded the peculiar intereſt of Great-Britain, ſeems, indeed, to have been perfectly ſimilar. There was ſcarce any other difference, than that Great-Britain, in conſequence of her ſucceſſes, ſince that time acquired more than ſhe then demanded; but ſtill the general idea, on which ſhe acquired, was nearly or altogether the ſame. But, with regard to ſome of our allies, the principle was greatly varied; and this change, we imagine, was ſufficiently juſtified by the alteration which had happened in the affairs of Germany, during the interval between the two treaties. Thoſe who conducted the negociation in 1761, were ſteady in rejecting every propoſition, in which they were not left at liberty to aid the king of Pruſſia with the whole force of Great-Britain: thoſe who concluded the peace in 1762, paid leſs attention to the intereſts, though they did not wholly neglect the ſafety, of that monarch. At the beginning of the year, and before they had entered into this negociation, they refuſed, as I have obſerved, to renew that article of the annual treaty, by which our court had engaged to conclude no peace without the conſent of his Pruſſian majeſty; though, at the ſame time, they declared themſelves willing to aſſiſt him with the annual ſubſidy. He, on his part, refuſed the ſubſidy, unconnected with that article. Some coldneſs grew between the two courts from this time forward.

The preliminaries of the peace, which were now pretty well known, were ſubjected to a ſevere ſcrutiny; and many plauſible arguments were advanced on both ſides of the queſtion. It was urged, on the one hand, that, in this treaty, we had loſt ſight of that great fundamental article, that France is chiefly, if not ſolely, to be dreaded in the light of a maritime and commercial power: that, therefore, we had, by reſtoring to her all her valuable Weſt-Indian iſlands, and by our conceſſions in the Newfoundland fiſhery, left in her hands the means of recovering her prodigious loſſes, and of becoming once more formidable to us at ſea: that the fiſhery trained up an innumerable multitude of young ſeamen; and that the Weſt-Indian trade employed them when they were trained: that France had, long ſince, gained a decided ſuperiority over us in this lucrative branch of commerce, and ſupplied almoſt all Europe with the rich commodities which are produced only in this part of the world: that, by this commerce, ſhe enriched her merchants, and augmented her finances; whilſt, from a want of ſugar land, which had been long known, and ſeverely felt, by England, we at once loſt the foreign trade, and ſuffered all the inconveniencies of a monopoly at home: that, at the cloſe of ſo expenſive a war, we might very reaſonably demand ſomething towards our indemnification, as well as towards our ſecurity: that it was evident, that our conqueſts in North-America, however they might provide for the one, were altogether inadequate to the other of theſe ends: that the ſtate of the preſent trade of theſe conqueſts was extremely low; the hopes of their future commerce were precarious; and the proſpect, at beſt, very remote: that we ſtood in need of ſupplies which would have an effect, certain, ſpeedy, and conſiderable: that the retaining both or even one of the conſiderable French iſlands, Martinico or Guadaloupe, would, and nothing elſe could, effectually anſwer this triple purpoſe: that the advantage was immediate; it was a matter, not of conjecture, but of account: that the trade with theſe conqueſts, was of the moſt lucrative nature, and of the moſt conſiderable extent; the number of ſhips employed in it were a great addition to our maritime power; the monopoly at home was corrected, and the foreign trade recovered; and, what was of equal weight, all that we gained on this ſyſtem, was made fourfold to us, by the loſs which enſued to France; but our conqueſts in North-America, however advantageous they might prove to us, with regard to the ſecurity of our ſettlements (for in that reſpect alone, they were of any moment) were of little detriment to the commerce of France; on the Weſt-Indian ſcheme of acquiſition, our gain and her loſs were in exact proportion: that the connection of this trade with that of our colonies in North-America, and with our commerce to the coaſt of Africa, was obvious at firſt ſight: that the African trade would be augmented by the demand for ſlaves; that of North-America would all center in ourſelves; whereas, if the iſlands were all reſtored, a great part of the benefit of the northern colony trade muſt redound, as it had hitherto done, to thoſe who had been lately our enemies, and would always be our rivals: that there was nothing extravagant or overbearing in this demand: that, though we ſhould retain either Martinico or Guadaloupe, or even both theſe iſlands, our conqueſts were ſuch, that there would ſtill be abundant matter left to diſplay our moderation in the ceſſion of the reſt; to ſay nothing of our many conceſſions in the fiſhery, on the coaſt of Africa, and in the Eaſt-Indies, of all which great branches of commerce the French had been intirely diſpoſſeſſed in this war, and to a conſiderable ſhare of which they would be reſtored by the treaty: that if further conceſſions be made (for which, however, there appeared no neceſſity) the demand in North-America might be ſomewhat contracted: that, by this method, we ſhould loſe nothing to our commerce; nor ſhould we, in the leaſt, hazard our ſecurity; as we ſhould ſtill be infinitely ſuperior in ſtrength; and whenever a war broke out, that power would be moſt ſecure, whoſe reſources were moſt conſiderable.

It was alledged, on the other hand, that the original object of the war was the ſecurity of our colonies on the continent; that the danger to which theſe colonies were expoſed, and, in conſequence of that danger, the immenſe waſte of blood and treaſure which enſued to Great-Britain, together with the calamities, which were, from the ſame ſource, derived upon the four quarters of the world, left no ſort of doubt, that it was not only our beſt, but our only policy, to guard againſt all poſſibility of the return of ſuch evils: that experience had ſhewn us, that while France poſſeſſed any ſingle place in America, from whence ſhe might moleſt our ſettlements, they could never enjoy any repoſe, and, of courſe, that we were never ſecure from being plunged again into thoſe calamities, from which we had, at length, and with ſo much difficulty, happily emerged: that to remove France from our neighbourhood in America, or to contract her power within the narroweſt limits poſſible, was therefore the moſt capital advantage we could obtain, and was worth purchaſing almoſt by any conceſſions: that the abſolute ſecurity derived from this plan, included in itſelf an indemnification; firſt, by ſaving us, more effectually than any other method could, from the neceſſity of another war, and conſequently by giving us an opportunity of increaſing our trade, and lowering our debt, ſecondly, by permitting our colonies on the continent to extend themſelves, without danger or moleſtation: that the great increaſe of population in thoſe colonies, within a few years, was notorious; and that their trade with the mother country had uniformly increaſed with this population: that being now freed from the moleſtation of enemies, and the emulation of rivals, unlimited in their poſſeſſions, and ſafe in their perſons, our American planters would, by the very courſe of their natural propagation, in a very ſhort time, furniſh out a demand of our manufactures, as large as all the working hands of Great-Britain could poſſibly ſupply: that there was therefore no reaſon to dread that want of trade which was ſuppoſed to be approaching; ſince North-America alone would ſupply the deficiencies of our trade in every other part of the world: that the great variety of climates, which that country contained, was a circumſtance of the moſt promiſing nature, and would be productive of the moſt beneficial effects on trade and commerce: that the value of our conqueſts, therefore, ought not to be eſtimated by their preſent produce, but by their probable increaſe; nor, indeed, ought the value of any country to be ſolely determined by its commercial advantages: that extent of territory, and a number of ſubjects, are matters of as much conſideration to a ſtate attentive to the ſources of real grandeur, as the mere advantages of traffic; the latter ideas being rather ſuitable to a limited and petty commonwealth, like Holland, than to a great, powerful, and warlike nation: that, on theſe principles, having made very large demands in North-America, it was neceſſary to relax in other parts: that France could never be brought to any conſiderable ceſſion in the Weſt-Indies; but that her power and increaſe there could never become formidable, inaſmuch as the exiſtence of her ſettlements depended upon ours in North-America, ſhe not being any longer left a place, from whence they can be ſupplied with proviſions: that, in loſing ſomething of the ſugar-trade, we loſt very little elſe than a luxury; and that as to the other produce of the Weſt-Indies, it might be, in a great meaſure, and in part was already ſupplied by our poſſeſſions on the continent, which daily increaſed not only in the quantity but in the kind of its produce.—I ſhall not pretend to paſs any judgment on the merits of the ſeveral ſides of this queſtion, which is certainly a very difficult one. I only relate opinions, as well as facts, hiſtorically.

While this treaty remained upon the carpet, it formed a great criſis, as well in the fortune of the new miniſtry, as in the affairs of the nation. Towards the latter end of the ſummer, Mr. F— was called in, and engaged in their ſupport. Though he continued in his old place of pay-maſter, he undertook to conduct the affairs of government in the houſe of commons. Mr. Gr——, whoſe office would naturally have engaged him in that taſk, reſigned the ſeals of ſecretary of ſtate, and was appointed firſt lord of the admiralty. The great experience and known parliamentary abilities of Mr. F— ſeemed to give new life to the affairs of the adminiſtration. A more vigorous and determined conduct was from that time adopted. Many of thoſe, who were not perfectly attached to the new ſyſtem, were immediately removed from their places; and meaſures were taken to clear every department of every friend of the D. of N——.

On the twenty-fifth day of November, the parliament being aſſembled, his majeſty harangued them from the throne. He obſerved, that the late war with Spain, and the attack of his ally, the king of Portugal, having greatly affected the commerce of his ſubjects, multiplied the objects of his military operations, and added to the heavy burthens of his people; he had willingly embraced an occaſion that offered of renewing the negotiation for peace. He gave them to underſtand, that the preliminary articles were actually ſigned: that, by the conditions in which all parties had acquieſced, an immenſe territory was added to the empire of Great-Britain; and a ſolid foundation laid for the increaſe of commerce; that care had been taken to remove all occaſions of future diſputes; that the king of Portugal was ſecured in all his dominions; and that all the territories of his German allies were evacuated by the troops of France. He lamented that a great number of his ſubjects had been loſt in different parts of the world; a conſideration which reinforced the other reaſons he had to engage in the negotiation; and that he had haſtened the concluſion of it, to prevent the neceſſity of making preparations for another campaign. He deſired the commons to conſider of ſuch methods in the ſettlement of the new acquiſitions, as ſhould moſt effectually tend to the ſecurity of thoſe countries, and to the improvement of the Britiſh trade and navigation. He recommended to their care and attention, his gallant ſubjects by whoſe valour thoſe acquiſitions were made. He obſerved, that union at home was peculiarly neceſſary to lay the foundation of that œconomy which they owed to themſelves and their poſterity, and which alone could relieve the nation from the heavy burthens entailed upon it by the neceſſities of a long expenſive war.

In anſwer to this ſpeech, addreſſes were preſented as uſual by both houſes containing general compliments of congratulation on the approach of peace, as well as upon the birth of the prince of Wales *; next day a ceſſation of arms was proclaimed; and orders were given for opening again all the channels of communication with France and Spain. When the upper houſe took the articles of the peace into conſideration, many objections were made by the lords in the oppoſition; and ſome ſevere reflections were thrown out againſt the earl of B—te, with appearance of heat and perſonal animoſity. That nobleman defended his own conduct with temper and decorum, in a well connected ſpeech delivered with great propriety, to the ſurprize of many, who did not think him ſo well qualified in the art and faculty of elocution. He gave a detail of the negotiation; and not only owned himſelf a warm promoter of the peace, but even expreſſed a deſire that this circumſtance ſhould be engraved upon his tomb. He was ſeconded by the earl of Halifax, and ſupported by a great majority.

The ſame good fortune attended the adminiſtration in the other houſe, where the oppoſition made its appearance in a number that was by no means formidable. Mr. P—tt, though in his health greatly indiſpoſed, reſolved to diſapprove the peace in perſon. He came into the houſe, ſupported on the arms of his friends, and obtained of the ſpeaker permiſſion to harangue ſitting. In this attitude he ſpoke above two hours without intermiſſion. The ſcope of his ſpeech was to juſtify his own conduct in the adminiſtration; and to give his opinion of the ſeparate articles of the peace, which upon the whole, he condemned as inadequate to the ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms. The mayor of London ſpoke on the ſame ſide, without making much impreſſion; and both houſes agreed upon addreſſes of approbation; which were preſented accordingly. The definitive treaty of peace, ſigned at Paris on the tenth day of February, was couched in theſe terms:

The Definitive Treaty of Peace and Friendſhip, between his Britannick Majeſty, the Moſt Chriſtian King, and the King of Spain. Concluded at Paris, the 10th Day of February, 1763. To which the King of Portugal acceded on the ſame Day.

In the Name of the moſt Holy and Undivided Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. So be it.

BE it known to all thoſe to whom it ſhall, or may, in any manner, belong.

"It has pleaſed the Moſt High to diffuſe the ſpirit of union and concord among the princes, whoſe diviſions had ſpread troubles in the four parts of the world, and to inſpire them with the inclination to cauſe the comforts of peace to ſucceed to the misfortunes of a long and bloody war, which having ariſen between England and France, during the reign of the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, George the Second, by the Grace of God, king of Great-Britain, of glorious memory, continued under the reign of the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, George the Third, ſucceſſor, and, in its progreſs, communicated itſelf to Spain and Portugal: conſequently, the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, George the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, Duke of Brunſwick and Lunenbourg, Arch-Treaſurer, and Elector, of the Holy Roman Empire; the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Lewis the Fifteenth, by the Grace of God, the moſt Chriſtian King; and the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Charles the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Spain and of the Indies, after having laid the foundations of peace in the preliminaries, ſigned at Fountainbleau the third of November laſt; and the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Don Joſeph the Firſt, by the Grace of God, King of Portugal and of the Algarves, after having acceded thereto, determined to complete without delay, this great and important work. For this purpoſe the high contracting parties have named and appointed their reſpective ambaſſadors extraordinary and miniſters plenipotentiary, viz. his Sacred Majeſty the King of Great-Britain, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord John Duke and Earl of Bedford, marquis of Taviſtock, &c. his miniſter of State, Lieutenant General of his Armies, Keeper of his Privy Seal, Knight of the moſt Noble Order of the Garter, and his Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Miniſter Plenipotentiary to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty: his Sacred Majeſty the Moſt Chriſtian King, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord Cæſar Gabriel de Choiſeul, Duke of Praſlin, peer of France, Knight of his Orders, Lieutenant General of his Armies, and of the province of Brittany, Counſellor of all his Councils, and Miniſter and Secretary of State, and of his Commands and Finances: his Sacred

Majeſty

Majeſty the Catholick King, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord, Don Jerome Grimaldi, Marquis de Grimaldi, Knight of the moſt Chriſtian King's Orders, Gentleman of his Catholick Majeſty's Bed-chamber in employment, and his Ambaſſador Extraordinary to his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty: his Sacred Majeſty the Moſt Faithful King, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord, Martin de Mello and Caſtro, Knight profeſſed of the Order of Chriſt, of his Moſt Faithful Majeſty's Council, and his Ambaſſador and Miniſter Plenipotentiary to his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty.

"Who, after having duly communicated to each other their full powers, in good form, have agreed upon the articles, the tenor of which is as follows:

"Art. I. There ſhall be a chriſtian, univerſal and perpetual peace, as well by ſea as by land, and a ſincere and conſtant friendſhip ſhall be reeſtabliſhed between their Britannick, Moſt Chriſtian, Catholick, and Moſt Faithful Majeſties, and between their heirs and ſucceſſors, kingdoms, dominions, provinces, countries, vaſſals, and ſubjects, of what quality or condition ſoever they be, without exceptions of places, or of perſons: ſo that the high contracting parties ſhall give the greateſt attention to maintain between themſelves and their ſaid dominions and ſubjects, this reciprocal friendſhip and correſpondence, without permitting, on either ſide, any kind of hoſtilities, by ſea or by land, to be committed from henceforth, for any cauſe, or under any pretence, whatſoever; and every thing ſhall be carefully avoided, which might hereafter prejudice the union happily reeſtabliſhed, applying themſelves, on the contrary, on every occaſion, to procure for each other whatever may contribute to their mutual glory, intereſts, and advantages, without giving any aſſiſtance or protection, directly or indirectly, to thoſe who would cauſe any prejudice to either of the high contracting parties: there ſhall be a general oblivion of every thing that may have been done or committed before, or ſince, the commencement of the war which is juſt ended.

"Art. II. The treaties of Weſtphalia of 1648; thoſe of Madrid between the two crowns of Great-Britain and Spain of 1667, and 1670; the treaties of peace of Nimeguen of 1678, and 1679; of Ryſwyck of 1697; thoſe of peace and of commerce of Utrecht of 1713; that of Baden of 1714; that of the triple alliance of the Hague of 1717; that of the quadruple alliance of London of 1718; the treaty of peace of Vienna of 1738; the definitive treaty of Aix la Chapelle of 1748; and that of Madrid, between the crown of Great-Britain and Spain, of 1750; as well as the treaties between the crowns of Spain and Portugal, of the 13th of February 1668; of the 6th of February 1715; and of the 12th of February 1716; and that of the 11th of April 1713; between France and Portugal with the guarantees of Great-Britain; ſerve as a baſis and foundation to the peace, and the preſent treaty: and for this purpoſe, they are all renewed and confirmed in the beſt form, as well as all the treaties in general, which ſubſiſted between the high contracting parties before the war, as if they were inſerted here word for word; ſo that they are to be exactly obſerved, for the future, in their whole tenor, and religiouſly executed on all ſides, in all their points, which ſhall not be derogated from by the preſent treaty; notwithſtanding all that may have been ſtipulated to the contrary by any of the high contracting parties: and all the ſaid parties declare, that they will not ſuffer any privilege, favour, or indulgence, to ſubſiſt, contrary to the treaties above confirmed, except what ſhall have been agreed and ſtipulated by the preſent treaty.

"Art. III. All the priſoners made on all ſides, as well by land as by ſea, and the hoſtages carried away, or given during the war, and to this day, ſhall be reſtored, without ranſom, ſix weeks at lateſt, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, each crown reſpectively paying the advances which ſhall have been made for the ſubſiſtence and maintenance of their priſoners, by the ſovereign of the country where they ſhall have been detained, according to the atteſted receipts and eſtimates, and other authentic vouchers, which ſhall be furniſhed on one ſide and the other: and ſecurities ſhall be reciprocally given for the payment of the debts which the priſoners ſhall have contracted in the countries where they have been detained, until their entire liberty. And all the ſhips of war and merchant-veſſels, which ſhall have been taken ſince the expiration of the terms agreed upon for the ceſſation of hoſtilities by ſea, ſhall be likewiſe reſtored bona fide, with all their crews and cargoes: and the execution of this article ſhall be proceeded upon immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

"Art. IV. His moſt Chriſtian Majeſty renounces all pretenſions which he has heretofore formed, or might form, to Nova Scotia, or Acadia in all its parts; and guarantees the whole of it, and with it all its dependencies, to the King of Great-Britain: moreover, his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty cedes and guaranties to his ſaid Britannick Majeſty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies, as well as the iſland of Cape Breton, and all the other iſlands and coaſts in the gulph and river St. Laurence, and, in general, every thing that depends on the ſaid countries, lands, iſlands, and coaſts, with the ſovereignty, property, poſſeſſion, and all rights acquired by treaty or otherwiſe, which the Moſt Chriſtian King, and the crown of France, have had, till now, over the ſaid countries, iſlands, lands, places, coaſts, and their inhabitants, ſo that the Moſt Chriſtian King cedes and makes over the whole to the ſaid King, and to the crown of Great-Britain, and that in the moſt ample manner and form, without reſtriction, and without any liberty to depart from the ſaid ceſſion and guaranty, under any pretence, or to diſturb Great-Britain in the poſſeſſions above-mentioned. His Britannick Majeſty, on his ſide, agrees to grant the liberty of the Catholick religion to the inhabitants of Canada: he will, conſequently, give the moſt preciſe and moſt effectual orders, that his new Roman Catholick ſubjects may profeſs the worſhip of their religion, according to the rites of the Romiſh church, as far as the laws of Great-Britain permit. His Britannick Majeſty further agrees, that the French inhabitants, or others who had been ſubjects of the Moſt Chriſtian King in Canada, may retire, with all ſafety and freedom, wherever they ſhall think proper, and may ſell their eſtates, provided vided it be to the ſubjects of his Britannick Majeſty, and bring away their effects, as well as their perſons, without being reſtrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecutions: the term limited for this emigration ſhall be fixed to the ſpace of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratification of the preſent treaty.

" V. The ſubjects of France ſhall have the liberty of fiſhing and drying on a part of the coaſts of the iſland of Newfoundland, ſuch as it is ſpecified in the XIIIth article of the treaty of Utrecht; which article is renewed and confirmed by the preſent treaty (except what relates to the iſland of Cape Breton, as well as to the other iſlands and coaſts in the mouth and in the gulph of St. Laurence): and his Britannick Majeſty conſents to leave to the ſubjects of the moſt Chriſtian King the liberty of fiſhing in the gulph St. Laurence, on condition that the ſubjects of France do not exerciſe the ſaid fiſhery, but at the diſtance of three leagues from all the coaſts belonging to Great-Britain, as well thoſe of the continent, as thoſe of the iſlands ſituated in the ſaid gulph St. Laurence. And as to what relates to the fiſhery on the coaſts of the iſland of Cape Breton out of the ſaid gulph, the ſubjects of the moſt Chriſtian King ſhall not be permitted to exerciſe the ſaid fiſhery, but at the diſtance of fifteen leagues from the coaſts of the iſland of Cape Breton; and the fiſhery on the coaſts of Nova Scotia or Acadia, and every where elſe out of the ſaid gulph, ſhall remain on the foot of former treaties.

" Art. VI. The King of Great-Britain cedes the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, in full right, to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, to ſerve as ſhelter to the French fiſhermen: and his ſaid Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty engages not to fortify the ſaid iſlands; to erect no buildings upon them, but merely for the convenience of the fiſhery; and to keep upon them a guard of fifty men only for the police.

" Art. VII. In order to re-eſtabliſh peace on ſolid and durable foundations, and to remove for ever all ſubject of diſpute with regard to the limits of the Britiſh and French territories on the continent of America; it is agreed, that, for the future, the confines between the dominions of his Britannick Majeſty and thoſe of his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, in that part of the world, ſhall be fixed irrevocably by a line drawn along the middle of the river Miſſiſippi, from its ſource to the river Iberville, and from thence, by a line drawn along the middle of this river, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the ſea; and for this purpoſe, the Moſt Chriſtian King cedes in full right, and guaranties to his Britannick Majeſty, the river and port of the Mobile, and every thing which he poſſeſſes, or ought to poſſeſs, on the left ſide of the river Miſſiſippi, except the town of New Orleans, and the iſland in which it is ſituated, which ſhall remain to France; provided that the navigation of the river Miſſiſippi ſhall be equally free, as well to the ſubjects of Great-Britain, as to thoſe of France, in its whole breadth and length, from its ſource to the ſea, and expreſsly that part which is between the ſaid iſland of New Orleans, and the right bank of that river, as well as the paſſage both in and out of its mouth. It is farther ſtipulated, that the veſſels belonging to the ſubjects of either nation, ſhall not be ſtopped, viſited, or ſubjected to the payment of any duty whatſoever. The ſtipulations inſerted in the IVth article, in favour of the inhabitants of Canada, ſhall alſo take place with regard to the inhabitants of the countries ceded by this article.

" Art. VIII. The King of Great-Britain ſhall reſtore to France the iſlands of Guadaloupe, of Marie Galante, of Deſirade, of Martinico, and of Belleiſle; and the fortreſſes of theſe iſlands ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in, when they were conquered by the Britiſh arms; provided that his Britannick Majeſty's ſubjects who ſhall have ſettled in the ſaid iſlands, or thoſe who ſhall have any commercial affairs to ſettle there, or in the other places reſtored to France by the preſent treaty, ſhall have liberty to ſell their lands and their eſtates, to ſettle their affairs, to recover their debts, and bring away their effects, as well as their perſons, on board veſſels, which they ſhall be permitted to ſend to the ſaid iſlands, and other places reſtored as above, and which ſhall ſerve for this uſe only, without being reſtrained on account of their religion, or under any other pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecutions: and for this purpoſe the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannick Majeſty's ſubjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannick Majeſty's ſubjects, to bring away their perſons and their effects, in veſſels of their nation, may be liable to abuſes, if precautions were not taken to prevent them; it has been expreſsly agreed between his Britannick Majeſty and his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, that the number of Engliſh veſſels, which ſhall have leave to go to the ſaid iſlands and places reſtored to France, ſhall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they ſhall go in ballaſt; ſhall ſet ſail at a fixed time; and ſhall make one voyage only, all the effects belonging to the Engliſh being to be embarked at the ſame time. It has been further agreed, that his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſhall cauſe the neceſſary paſſports to be given to the ſaid veſſels; that, for the greater ſecurity, it ſhall be allowed to place two French clerks, or guards, in each of the ſaid veſſels, which ſhall be viſited in the landing places and ports of the ſaid iſlands and places reſtored to France, and that the merchandize which ſhall be found therein ſhall be confiſcated.

" Art. IX. The Moſt Chriſtian King cedes and guaranties to his Britannick Majeſty, in full right, the iſlands of Grenada, and of the Grenadines, with the ſame ſtipulations in favour of the inhabitants of this colony, inſerted in the IVth article for thoſe of Canada: and the partition of the iſlands called Neutral, is agreed and fixed, ſo that thoſe of St. Vincent, Dominica, and Tobago, ſhall remain in full right to Great-Britain, and that of St. Lucia ſhall be delivered to France, to enjoy the ſame likewiſe in full right; and the high contracting parties guaranty the partition ſo ſtipulated.

" Art. X. His Britannick Majeſty ſhall reſtore to France the iſland of Goree in the condition it was in when conquered: and his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty cedes in full right, and guaranties to the King of Great-Britain, the river Senegal, with the forts and factories of St. Lewis, Podor, and Galam; and with all the rights and dependencies of the ſaid river Senegal.

" Art. XI. In the Eaſt-Indies, Great-Britain ſhall reſtore to France, in the condition they are now in, the different factories which that crown poſſeſſed, as well on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, as on that of Malabar, as alſo in Bengal, at the beginning of the year 1749. And his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty renounces all pretenſions to the acquiſition which he had made on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, ſince the ſaid beginning of the year 1749. His Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſhall reſtore on his ſide, all that he may have conquered from Great-Britain, in the Eaſt-Indies, during the preſent war; and will expreſsly cauſe Nattal and Tapanoully in the iſland of Sumatra, to be reſtored; he engages further not to erect fortifications, or to keep troops, in any part of the dominions of the Subah of Bengal. And in order to preſerve future peace on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, the Engliſh and French ſhall acknowledge Mahomet Ally Khan for lawful Nabob of the Carnatick, and Salabat Jing for lawful Subah of the Decan; and both parties ſhall renounce all demands and pretenſions of ſatisfaction, with which they might charge each other, or their Indian allies, for their depredations, or pillage, committed, on the one ſide or on the other, during the war.

" Art. XII. The iſland of Minorca ſhall be reſtored to his Britannick Majeſty, as well as Fort St. Philip, in the ſame condition they were in, when conquered by the arms of the Moſt Chriſtian King; and with the artillery which was there, when the ſaid iſland and the ſaid fort were taken.

" Art. XIII. The town and port of Dunkirk ſhall be put into the ſtate fixed by the laſt treaty of Aix la Chapelle, and by former treaties. The cunette ſhall be deſtroyed immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, as well as the forts and batteries which defend the entrance on the ſide of the ſea; and proviſion ſhall be made, at the ſame time, for the wholeſomeneſs of the air, and for the health of the inhabitants, by ſome other means, to the ſatisfaction of the King of Great-Britain.

" Art. XIV. France ſhall reſtore all the countries belonging to the electorate of Hanover, to the Landgrave of Heſſe, to the Duke of Brunſwick, and to the Count of La Lippe Buckebourg, which are or ſhall be occupied by his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's arms: the fortreſſes of theſe different countries ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in when conquered by the French arms; and the pieces of artillery, which ſhall have been carried elſewhere, ſhall be replaced by the ſame number, of the ſame bore, weight, and metal.

" Art. XV. In caſe the ſtipulations contained in the XIIIth article of the preliminaries, ſhould not be completed at the time of the ſignature of the preſent treaty, as well with regard to the evacuations to be made by the armies of France of the fortreſſes of Cleves, Weſel, Guelders, and of all the countries belonging to the King of Pruſſia, as with regard to the evacuations to be made by the Britiſh and French armies of the countries which they occupy in Weſtphalia, Lower Saxony, on the Lower Rhine, Upper Rhine, and in all the empire, and to the retreat of the troops into the dominions of their reſpective ſovereigns: their Britannick and Moſt Chriſtian Majeſties promiſe to proceed, bona fide, with all the diſpatch the caſe will permit of, to the ſaid evacuations, the entire completion whereof they ſtipulate before the 15th of March next, or ſooner if it can be done: and their Britannick and Moſt Chriſtian Majeſties further engage and promiſe to each other, not to furniſh any ſuccours, of any kind, to their reſpective allies who ſhall continue engaged in the war in Germany.

" Art. XVI. The deciſion of the prizes made in time of peace, by the ſubjects of Great Britain, on the Spaniards, ſhall be referred to the courts of juſtice of the admiralty of Great-Britain, conformably to the rules eſtabliſhed among all nations, ſo that the validity of the ſaid prizes, between the Britiſh and Spaniſh nations, ſhall be decided and judged, according to the law of nations, and according to treaties in the courts of juſtice of the nation who ſhall have made the capture.

" Art. XVII. His Britannick Majeſty ſhall cauſe to be demoliſhed all the fortifications which his ſubjects ſhall have erected in the Bay of Honduras, and other places of the territory of Spain in that part of the world, four months after the ratification of the preſent treaty: and his Catholick Majeſty ſhall not permit his Britannick Majeſty's ſubjects, or their workmen, to be diſturbed, or moleſted, under any pretence whatſoever, in the ſaid places, in their occupation of cutting, loading, and carrying away, logwood: and for this purpoſe they may build without hindrance, and occupy without interruption, the houſes and magazines which are neceſſary for them, for their families, and for their effects: and his Catholick Majeſty aſſures to them, by this article, the full enjoyment of thoſe advantages, and powers, on the Spaniſh coaſts and territories, as above ſtipulated, immediately after the ratification of the preſent treaty.

" Art. XVIII. His Catholick Majeſty deſiſts, as well for himſelf as for his ſucceſſors, from all pretenſions which he may have formed in favour of the Guipuſcoans, and other his ſubjects, to the right of fiſhing in the neighbourhood of the iſland of Newfoundland.

" Art. XIX. The King of Great-Britain ſhall reſtore to Spain all the territory which he has conquered in the iſland of Cuba, with the fortreſs of the Havanna; and this fortreſs, as well as all the other fortreſſes of the ſaid iſland, ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in when conquered by his Britannick Majeſty's arms; provided that his Britannick Majeſty's ſubjects who ſhall have ſettled in the ſaid iſland, reſtored to Spain by the preſent treaty, or thoſe who ſhall have any commercial affairs to ſettle there, ſhall have liberty to ſell their lands and their eſtates, to ſettle their affairs, to recover their debts, and to bring away their effects as well as their perſons, on board veſſels which they ſhall be permitted to ſend to the ſaid iſland reſtored as above, and which ſhall ſerve for that uſe only, without being reſtrained on account of their religion, or under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecution: and for this purpoſe the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannick Majeſty's ſubjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannick Majeſty's ſubjects, to bring away their perſons perſons and their effects, in veſſels of their nation, may be liable to abuſes, if precautions are not taken to prevent them; it has been expreſsly agreed between his Britannick Majeſty and his Catholick Majeſty, that the number of Engliſh veſſels, which ſhall have leave to go to the ſaid iſland reſtored to Spain, ſhall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they ſhall go in ballaſt; ſhall ſet ſail at a fixed time; and ſhall make one voyage only; all the effects belonging to the Engliſh being to be embarked at the ſame time: It has been further agreed, that his Catholick Majeſty ſhall cauſe the neceſſary paſſports to be given to the ſaid veſſels; that, for the greater ſecurity, it ſhall be allowed to place two Spaniſh clerks, or guards, in each of the ſaid veſſels, which ſhall be viſited in the landing-places, and ports of the ſaid iſland reſtored to Spain, and that the merchandize, which ſhall be found therein, ſhall be confiſcated.

"Art. XX. In conſequence of the reſtitution ſtipulated in the preceding article, his Catholick Majeſty cedes and guaranties, in full right, to his Britannick Majeſty, Florida, with Fort St. Auguſtin, and the bay of Penſacola, as well as all that Spain poſſeſſes on the continent of North-America, to the eaſt or to the ſouth-eaſt of the river Miſſiſippi, and, in general, every thing that depends on the ſaid countries and lands, with the ſovereignty, property, poſſeſſion, and all rights, acquired by treaties, or otherwiſe, which the Catholick King, and the crown of Spain have had, till now, over the ſaid countries, lands, places, and other inhabitants; ſo that the Catholick King cedes and makes over the whole to the ſaid King, and to the crown of Great-Britain, and that in the moſt ample manner and form. His Britannick Majeſty agrees, on his ſide, to grant to the inhabitants of the countries above ceded, the liberty of the Catholic religion: he will conſequently give the moſt expreſs and the moſt effectual orders that his new Roman Catholick ſubjects may profeſs the worſhip of their religion, according to the rites of the Romiſh church, as far as the laws of Great-Britain permit: his Britannick Majeſty farther agrees, that the Spaniſh inhabitants, or others who had been ſubjects of the Catholick King in the ſaid countries, may retire, with all ſafety and freedom, wherever they think proper; and may ſell their eſtates, provided it be to his Britannick Majeſty's ſubjects, and bring away their effects, as well as their perſons without being reſtrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts or of criminal proſecutions; the term limited for this emigration being fixed to the ſpace of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty. It is moreover ſtipulated, that his Catholick Majeſty ſhall have power to cauſe all the effects that may belong to him to be brought away, whether it be artillery, or other things.

"Art. XXI. The French and Spaniſh troops ſhall evacuate all the territories, lands, towns, places, and caſtles, of his moſt Faithful Majeſty in Europe, without any reſerve, which ſhall have been conquered by the armies of France and Spain, and ſhall reſtore them in the ſame condition they were in when conquered, with the ſame artillery, and ammunition, which were found there: and with regard to the Portugueſe colonies in America, Africa, or in the Eaſt-Indies, if any change ſhall have happened there, all things ſhall be reſtored on the ſame footing they were in, and conformably to the preceding treaties, which ſubſiſted between the courts of France, Spain, and Portugal, before the preſent war.

"Art. XXII. All the papers, letters, documents, and archives, which were found in the countries, territories, towns, and places, that are reſtored, and thoſe belonging to the countries ceded, ſhall be reſpectively and bona fide, delivered, or furniſhed at the ſame time, if poſſible, that poſſeſſion is taken, or, at lateſt, four months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, in whatever places the ſaid papers or documents may be found.

"Art. XXIII. All the countries and territories, which may have been conquered, in whatſoever part of the world, by the arms of their Britannick and Moſt Faithful Majeſties, as well as by thoſe of their Moſt Chriſtian and Catholick Majeſties, which are not included in the preſent treaty, either under the title of ceſſions, or under the title of reſtitutions, ſhall be reſtored without difficulty, and without requiring any compenſation.

"Art. XXIV. As it is neceſſary to aſſign a fixed epoch for the reſtitutions, and the evacuations, to be made by each of the high contracting parties; it is agreed, that the Britiſh and French troops ſhall complete, before the 15th of March next, all that ſhall remain to be executed of the XIIth and XIIIth articles of the preliminaries, ſigned the 3d day of November laſt, with regard to the evacuation to be made in the empire, or elſewhere. The iſland of Belleiſle ſhall be evacuated ſix weeks after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. Guadaloupe, Deſirade, Marie Galante, Martinico, and St. Lucia, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. Great-Britain ſhall likewiſe, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner if it can be done, enter into poſſeſſion of the river and port of the Mobile, and of all that is to form the limits of the territory of Great-Britain, on the ſide of the river Miſſiſippi, as they are ſpecified in the VIIth article. The iſland of Goree ſhall be evacuated by Great-Britain, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty; and the iſland of Minorca, by France, at the ſame epoch, or ſooner if it can be done: and according to the conditions of the VIth article, France ſhall likewiſe enter into poſſeſſion of the iſlands of St. Peter and of Miquelon, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty. The factories in the Eaſt-Indies ſhall be reſtored ſix months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. The fortreſs of the Havanna, with all that has been conquered in the iſland of Cuba, ſhall be reſtored three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done: and, at the ſame time, Great-Britain ſhall enter into poſſeſſion of the country ceded by Spain, according to the XXth article. All the places and countries of his Moſt Faithful Majeſty in Europe, ſhall be reſtored imme-immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty; and the Portugueſe colonies, which may have been conquered, ſhall be reſtored in the ſpace of three months in the Weſt-Indies, and of ſix months in the Eaſt-Indies, after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner if it can be done. All the fortreſſes, the reſtitution whereof is ſtipulated above, ſhall be reſtored with the artillery and ammunition which were found there at the time of the conqueſt. In conſequence whereof, the neceſſary orders ſhall be ſent by each of the high contracting parties, with reciprocal paſſports for the ſhips that ſhall carry them, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty.

" Art. XXV. His Britannick Majeſty, as Elector of Brunſwick Lunenbourg, as well for himſelf, as for his heirs and ſucceſſors, and all the dominions and poſſeſſions of his ſaid Majeſty in Germany, are included and guarantied by the preſent treaty of peace.

" Art. XXVI. Their Sacred Britannick, Moſt Chriſtian, Catholick, and Moſt Faithful Majeſties, promiſe to obſerve, ſincerely and bona fide, all the articles contained and ſettled in the preſent treaty; and they will not ſuffer the ſame to be infringed, directly or indirectly, by their reſpective ſubjects; and the ſaid high contracting parties, generally and reciprocally, guaranty to each other all the ſtipulations of the preſent treaty.

" Art. XXVII. The ſolemn ratifications of the preſent treaty, expedited in good and due form, ſhall be exchanged in this city of Paris between the high contracting parties, in the ſpace of a month, or ſooner if poſſible, to be computed from the day of the ſignature of the preſent treaty.

" In witneſs whereof, we the underwritten, their Ambaſſadors Extraordinary and Miniſters Plenipotentiary, have ſigned with our hand, in their name, and in virtue of our full powers, the preſent Definitive Treaty, and have cauſed the ſeal of our arms to be put thereto."

SEPARATE ARTICLES.

I. SOME of the titles made uſe of by the contracting powers, either in their full powers and other acts, during the courſe of the negociation, or in the preamble of the preſent treaty, not being generally acknowledged; it has been agreed, That no prejudice ſhall ever reſult therefrom to any of the ſaid contracting parties, and that the titles taken or omitted on either ſide, on occaſion of the ſaid negotiation and of the preſent treaty, ſhall not be cited or quoted as a precedent.

II. It has been agreed and determined, That the French language, made uſe of in all the copies of the preſent treaty, ſhall not become an example, which may be alledged, or made a precedent of, or prejudice, in any manner, any of the contracting powers; and that they ſhall conform themſelves, for the future, to what has been obſerved, and ought to be obſerved, with regard to, and on the part of, powers who are uſed, and have a right, to give and to receive copies of like treaties in another language than French; the preſent treaty having ſtill the ſame force and effect, as if the aforeſaid cuſtom had been therein obſerved.

III. Though the King of Portugal has not ſigned the preſent definitive treaty, their Britannick, Moſt Chriſtian, and Catholick Majeſties, acknowledge, nevertheleſs, that his Moſt Faithful Majeſty is formally included therein as a contracting party, and as if he had expreſsly ſigned the ſaid treaty; conſequently, their Britannick, Moſt Chriſtian, and Catholick Majeſties, reſpectively and conjointly, promiſe to his Moſt Faithful Majeſty, in the moſt expreſs and moſt binding manner, the execution of all and every the clauſes contained in the ſaid treaty, on his act of acceſſion.

The preſent ſeparate articles ſhall have the ſame force as if they were inſerted in the treaty.

Declaration of his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's Plenipotentiary, with regard to the debts due to the Canadians.

THE King of Great-Britain having deſired, that the payment of the letters of exchange and bills which have been delivered to the Canadians for the neceſſaries furniſhed to the French troops, ſhould be ſecured, his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, entirely diſpoſed to render to every one that juſtice which is legally due to them, has declared, and does declare, that the ſaid bills and letters of exchange ſhall be punctually paid, agreeably to a liquidation made in a convenient time, according to the diſtance of the places, and to what ſhall be poſſible; taking care, however, that the bills and letters of exchange, which the French ſubjects may have at the time of this declaration, be not confounded with the bills and letters of exchange which are in the poſſeſſion of the new ſubjects of the King of Great-Britain.

In witneſs whereof, we the underwritten miniſter of his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, duly authorized for this purpoſe, have ſigned the preſent declaration, and cauſed the ſeal of our arms to be put thereto.

Declaration of his Britannick Majeſty's Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, with regard to the limits of Bengal in the Eaſt-Indies.

WE the underwritten Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the King of Great-Britain, in order to prevent all ſubject of diſpute on account of the limits of the dominions of the Subah of Bengal, as well as of the coaſt of Coromandel, and Orixa, declare, in the name, and by order of his ſaid Britannick Majeſty, that the ſaid dominions of the Subah of Bengal ſhall be reputed not to extend farther than Yanaon excluſively, and that Yanaon ſhall be conſidered as included in the north part of the coaſt of Coromandel or Orixa.

The

The reader will, at one glance, perceive that theſe terms are more advantageous to Great-Britain and her allies, than thoſe which were agreed to by the late miniſter. He muſt determine for himſelf, whether they were ſuch as ſhe ought to have inſiſted upon, in conſequence of her additional ſucceſſes. Certainly they were more favourable for France and Spain, than thoſe powers could have reaſonably expected to enjoy, after the loſſes they had ſuſtained. It muſt be acknowledged that Great-Britain, by extending the frontiers of Canada to the middle of the Miſſiſippi, gained a large tract of fertile country lying on the banks of that river, beſides the advantage of a free navigation upon it, and the poſſeſſion of the port of Mobile: but, in order to ſecure the Engliſh American colonies from all poſſibility of diſturbance from the French, that reſtleſs nation ought to have been expelled from New Orleans, and the whole country of Louiſiana; for, while they remain in this ſettlement, at liberty to penetrate by the river to the remote tribes of Indians, they will ſtill maintain their influence among thoſe ſavages: they will ſupply them with neceſſaries, conſequently weaken their dependence upon the Engliſh; and employ their arts of inſinuation upon them ſo effectually, as to have it always in their power to hunt them upon the defenceleſs back-ſettlements of the Britiſh coloniſts. It does not appear that the Britiſh miniſtry were well acquainted with the importance of this article.

England, by this peace, likewiſe gained an acceſſion, in France's ceding to her the iſland of Grenada, which, when fully cultivated and peopled, may be of ſome conſequence. She moreover acquired the unſettled iſlands of Dominica, Tobago, and St. Vincent; but yielded to France the iſland of St. Lucie, ſaid to be worth all the reſt. She retains the ſettlement of Senegal on the coaſt of Africa, by which ſhe engroſſes the whole gum trade of that country; as for the rock of Goree, which ſhe reſtored, it was no great ſacrifice. The article that relates to the Eaſt-Indies, was dictated by the directors of the Engliſh company; and ſurely the French have no reaſon to complain of its ſeverity, as it reſtores them to the poſſeſſion of all the places they had at the beginning of the war, on condition that they ſhall maintain neither forts nor forces in the kingdom of Bengal; thus they will enjoy all their former advantages in trade, without the temptation and expence of forming ſchemes of conqueſt and dominion.

As the treaty makes no mention of the ſhips taken from the ſubjects of France before the declaration of war, in all probability, the king of Great-Britain agreed that their owners ſhould be indemnified; a conceſſion which barely atones for a meaſure which (whatever may have been alledged in its juſtification) will always be conſidered by the candid and impartial, as an act of violence and rapine, that ſtrikes at the very root of the law of nations, which, for the intereſts of humanity in general, ought to be held ſacred, even amidſt the warmeſt tranſports of animoſity and reſentment.

The liberty of cutting logwood in the bay of Honduras, granted to the ſubjects of Great-Britain, was undoubtedly a great point gained in their favour; but their obliging themſelves to demoliſh their fortifications on that coaſt, was a tacit acknowledgement that the privilege was not founded upon right, but derived from favour. His catholick majeſty's renouncing all pretenſions in favour of his ſubjects, to the right of fiſhing on the coaſts of Newfoundland, was a puny ſacrifice, ſomething in appearance, but nothing in reality: for the claim was almoſt as obſolete as that of the Engliſh monarch to the dominions of France. The ceſſion of Florida, with the forts of St. Auguſtine and Penſacola, to Great-Britain, was an object of much greater importance. It extended the Britiſh dominions along the coaſt to the mouth of the Miſſiſippi. It removed an aſylum for the ſlaves of the Engliſh colonies, who were continually making their eſcape to St. Auguſtine. It deprived the Spaniards of an eaſy avenue, through which they had it in their power to invade Georgia and Carolina; it afforded a large extent of improveable territory, a ſtrong frontier, and a good port in the bay of Mexico, both for the convenience of trade, and annoyance of the Spaniards in any future conteſt. But neither the ceſſion of Florida, nor the renunciation of the right to the fiſhery, nor the permiſſion granted to the Engliſh logwood cutters, nor the evacuation of Portugal, nor all theſe articles together, can ever be eſteemed equivalent to the reſtitution of the Havanna; for which, indeed, the Spaniſh monarch had no ſuitable compenſation to make, without diſmembring his kingdom, unleſs he had thrown into the ſcale with his other conceſſions, that of a free navigation, without ſearch, to the Britiſh traders on the coaſt of New Spain. This was an advantage with which the people of England flattered their own imaginations: but it was a privilege which the court of Madrid could not grant, without opening the avenues of a contraband trade between the Engliſh and Spaniſh creoles, which would have been fatal to the commerce of Old Spain: becauſe, in that caſe, his catholick majeſty's American ſubjects would have ſupplied themſelves at the firſt hand, with European commodities, from the trading ſhips of Great-Britain; and great part of the wealth of that country would have been conveyed immediately to England.

The crown of Spain was much favoured by the article which ſtipulates, that the conqueſts not included in the treaty either as ceſſions or reſtitutions, ſhould be reſtored without compenſation. Neither France nor Spain had any armament on foot, from which they could expect the leaſt acquiſition or ſucceſs; whereas the miniſtry of England had great reaſon to believe that the iſland of Luconia was already reduced.

On the whole, the treaty, tho' perhaps it might have been more favourable in ſome articles, certainly confirmed great and ſolid advantages to Great-Britain; and will remain as an eternal monument of that moderation which forms the moſt amiable flower in the wreath of conqueſt.

France and England, having mutually withdrawn themſelves from the war in Germany, the courts of Vienna and Berlin began to think in earneſt of an accommodation. The empreſs-queen had but little hopes of prevailing, by her own ſtrength alone, againſt a prince who had ſo long withſtood the joint efforts of ſo many powerful confederates. On the other hand, the king of Pruſſia had no more ſubſidies to expect from Great-Britain, and little more to gain by contribution and compulſion in the provinces of Germany, which he had already, in a great meaſure, depopulated and impoveriſhed. Perhaps he was ſick of a war, which, in ſpite of all his activity and ſucceſs, had expoſed him to incredible fatigue, and repeated mortification. Both parties having expreſſed a deſire of peace, conferences were opened at Hubertſburg, by the Auſtrian, Pruſſian, and Poliſh plenipotentiaries; and the articles were, in a little time, adjuſted. The treaties of pacification between theſe powers imported, that the troops on all ſides ſhould be withdrawn from the countries which had been invaded and poſſeſſed in the courſe of the war; that peace ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed on the footing of former treaties, and each party ſit down quietly with the loſs it had ſuſtained.

Such was the iſſue of a war, ſanguinary beyond example, which had raged with uncommon fury in the four quarters of the globe; which had ruined many fair provinces; and, in the ſpace of ſeven years, deſtroyed above a million of lives; which had coſt Great-Britain, in particular, above two hundred and eighty thouſand men, including a great number of brave and able officers, with an incredible quantity of treaſure; and increaſed the burthen of her national debt, from fourſcore, to one hundred and thirty millions ſterling.

Of the State of Commerce, Learning, Agriculture, &c. from the Revolution to the Concluſion of the Peace in 1763.

COMMERCE.

THE commerce of Great Britain continued to increaſe during the whole courſe of this period; nor was this increaſe the effect of extraordinary encouragement. On the contrary, the neceſſities of government, the growing expences of the nation, and the continual augmentation of the public debt, obliged the legiſlature to hamper trade with manifold and grievous impoſitions; its increaſe, therefore, muſt have been owing to the natural progreſs of induſtry and adventure, extending themſelves to that fartheſt line or limit beyond which they will not be able to advance: when the tide of traffick has flowed to its higheſt mark, it will then begin to recede in a gradual ebb, until it is ſhrunk within the narrow limits of its original channel. War, which naturally impedes the traffick of other nations, has opened new ſources to the merchants of Great Britain: the ſuperiority of her naval power hath cruſhed the navigation of France, her great rival in commerce; ſo that ſhe ſupplies, on her own terms, all thoſe foreign markets at which in time of peace ſhe was underſold by that dangerous competitor. Thus her trade is augmented to a ſurprizing pitch; and this great augmentation alone has enabled her to maintain the war at ſuch an enormous expence. Foreign nations will doubtleſs be ſurprized to learn, that above eight thouſand ſhips are employed by the traders of Great Britain; and that the produce of the ſinking fund, which is the overplus produced by all the different funds appropriated to defray the intereſt of the national debt, exceeds annually three millions ſterling.

The following account of the trade to the Eaſt Indies, from a perſon who is far from being prejudiced in favour of the company, may poſſibly convey a juſter idea of the nature and extent of the company's commerce than any thing hitherto ſaid on this ſubject. The errors found in it will I hope be imputed to the true author, who has not thought proper to oblige the world with his name, or rather to the nature of the thing, in itſelf ſufficiently dark and intricate, and beſides moſt carefully hid from the eyes of the vulgar. His authorities however ſeem to be ſufficiently ſolid, being chiefly the public accounts of the company's ſales and other tranſactions, at leaſt ſo far as regards his own plan, which was to repreſent this corporation as an inſtitution highly prejudicial to the trade and commerce of Great Britain.

This traffic, ſays my author, employs yearly ſeventeen ſail of fine capital ſhips, each of the burden of five hundred tons, by the company's account, mounting thirty guns, and manned with one hundred mariners. He then proceeds to give his readers the

My author takes notice, that the cargoes of ſeventeen ſhips are here allowed to be returned, whereas no more than fourteen were actually loaded outwards; he had before obſerved, that the manufactures in braſs, copper, iron, pewter, and other materials, did not exceed the value of 300,000l. He likewiſe omits to charge any thing for inſurance. There is moreover 5 per cent. allowed over the real prices at the candle, amounting as he ſays (by way of irony probably) to the ſmall ſum of 140,000l. All which particulars he ſays, will ſerve to anſwer all objections againſt his ſyſtem. He then ſtates the account of profit and loſs on a voyage to India, thus,

LEARNING, LEARNED MEN, &c.

THE powers of the human mind were freely and fully exerciſed in this period. Conſiderable progreſs was made in mathematics and aſtronomy by divers individuals; among whom we number Newton, Halley, Wallis, Barrow, Flamſtead, Hudſon, Sanderſon, Bradley, Maclaurin, Smith, and the two Simpſons.

Natural philoſophy became a general ſtudy, and the new doctrine of electricity grew into faſhion. Different methods were diſcovered for rendering ſea-water potable and ſweet; and divers uſeful hints were communicated to the publick by the learned doctor Stephen Hale, who directed all his reſearches and experiments to the benefit of ſociety. The ſtudy of alchemy no longer prevailed; but the art of chemiſtry was perfectly underſtood, and aſſiduouſly applied to the purpoſes of ſophiſtication.

The clergy of Great Britain were generally learned, pious, and exemplary. Atterbury, Sherlock, Hoadley, Secker, and Conybeare, were promoted to the firſt dignities of the church. Warburton, who had long ſignalized himſelf by the ſtrength and boldneſs of his genius, his extenſive capacity, and profound erudition, at length obtained the mitre. But theſe promotions were granted to reaſons of ſtate convenience, and perſonal intereſt, rather than as rewards of extraordinary merit. Many other eccleſiaſtics of worth and learning were totally overlooked. Nor was eccleſiaſtical merit confined to the eſtabliſhed church. Many inſtances of extraordinary genius, unaffected piety, and univerſal moderation, appeared among the diſſenting miniſters of Great Britain and Ireland: among theſe we particularize the elegant, the primitive Foſter; the learned, ingenious, and penetrating Leland.

The progreſs of reaſon, and free cultivation of the human mind, had not however entirely baniſhed thoſe ridiculous ſects and ſchiſms of which the kingdom had been formerly ſo productive. Impoſture and fanaticiſm ſtill hung upon the ſkirts of religion. Weak minds were ſeduced by the deluſions of a ſuperſtition ſtiled Methodiſm, raiſed upon the affectation of ſuperior ſanctity, and maintained by pretenſions to divine illumination. Many thouſands in the lower ranks of life were infected with this ſpecies of enthuſiaſm, by the unwearied endeavours of a few obſcure preachers; who propagated their doctrines to the moſt remote corners of the Britiſh dominions, and found means to lay the whole kingdom under contribution.

Fanaticiſm alſo formed a league with falſe philoſophy. One Hutchinſon, a viſionary, intoxicated with the fumes of Rabbinical learning, pretended to deduce all demonſtration from Hebrew roots, and to confine all human knowledge to the five books of Moſes. His diſciples became numerous after his death. With the Methodiſts, they denied the merit of good works; and bitterly inveighed againſt Newton as an ignorant pretender, who had preſumed to ſet up his own ridiculous chimæras in oppoſition to the ſacred philoſophy of the Pentateuch. But the moſt extraordinary ſect which diſtinguiſhed this reign was that of the Moravians, or Hernhutters, imported from Germany by count Zinzendorf, who might have been termed the Melchizedec of his followers, inaſmuch as he aſſumed among them the three-fold character of prophet, prieſt, and king. They could not be ſo properly ſtyled a ſect as the diſciples of an original, who had invented a new ſyſtem of religion. Their chief adoration was paid to the Second Perſon in the Trinity: the Firſt they treated with the moſt ſhocking neglect. Some of their tenets were indecent, and others ridiculouſly abſurd. Their diſcipline was a ſtrange mixture of devotion and impurity. Their exterior worſhip conſiſted of hymns, prayers, and ſermons: the hymns extremely ludicrous, and often indecent, alluding to the ſide hole or wound which Chriſt received from a ſpear in his ſide, while he remained upon the croſs. Their ſermons frequently contained very groſs incentives to the work of propagation. Their private exerciſes are ſaid to have abounded with ſuch rites and myſteries as we cannot explain, with any regard to decorum. They profeſſed a community of goods; and were governed as one family, in temporals as well as ſpirituals, by a council, or kind of preſbytery, in which the count, as their ordinary, preſided. In caſes of doubt, or great conſequence, theſe pretended to conſult the Saviour, and to decide from immediate inſpiration; ſo that they boaſted of being under the immediate direction of a Theocracy; though, in fact, they were ſlaves to the moſt dangerous kind of deſpotiſm: for as often as any individual of the community preſumed to think for himſelf, or differ in opinion from the ordinary and his band of aſſociates, the oracle decreed, that he ſhould be inſtantly ſent upon the miſſion which they had fixed in Greenland, or to the colony they had eſtabliſhed in Pennſylvania. As the religioniſts conſiſted chiefly of manufacturers, who appeared very ſober, orderly, and induſtrious; and their chief declared his intention of proſecuting works of public emolument, they obtained a ſettlement under a parliamentary ſanction in England, where they ſoon made a conſiderable number of proſelytes, before their principles were fully diſcovered and explained.

Many ingenious treatiſes on metaphyſics and morality appeared in the courſe of this period; and a philoſophical ſpirit of enquiry diffuſed itſelf to the fartheſt extremities of the united kingdom. Tho' few diſcoveries of importance were made in medicine, yet that art was well underſtood in all its different branches; and many of its profeſſors diſtinguiſhed themſelves in other provinces of literature. Beſides the Medical Eſſays of London and Edinburgh, the phyſician's library was enriched with many uſeful modern productions; with the works of the claſſical Freind, the elegant Mead, the accurate Huxham, and the philoſophical Pringle. The art of midwifery was elucidated by ſcience, reduced to fixed principles, and almoſt wholly conſigned into the hands of men practitioners. The reſearches of anatomy were proſecuted to ſome curious diſcoveries by the ingenuity and dexterity of a Hunter and a Monro. The numerous hoſpitals in London contributed to the improvement of ſurgery, which was brought to perfection under the auſpices of a Cheſelden and a Sharpe. The advantages of agriculture, which had long flouriſhed in England, extended themſelves gradually to the moſt remote and barren provinces of the iſland.

The reſpectable patriots that form the Society eſtabliſhed at London, have already done conſiderable ſervice to their country, and will, it is hoped, ſtill do more: a conſiderable number of machines having already been ſent them, in conſequence of their large premiums and bounties.

The mechanic powers were well underſtood, and judiciouſly applied to many uſeful machines of neceſſity and convenience. The mechanical arts had attained to all that perfection which they were capable of acquiring; but the avarice and oppreſſion of contractors, obliged the handicraftſman to exert his ingenuity, not in finiſhing his work well, but in affording it cheap; in purchaſing bad materials, and performing his taſk in a hurry; in concealing flaws, ſubſtituting ſhew for ſolidity, and ſacrificing reputation to the thirſt of lucre. Thus many of the Engliſh manufactures, being found ſlight and unſerviceable, grew into diſcredit abroad; thus the art of producing them more perfect, may in time be totally loſt at home. The cloths now made in England, are inferior in texture and fabric to thoſe which were manufactured in the beginning of the century; and the ſame judgment may be pronounced upon almoſt every article of hardware. The razors, knives, ſciſſars, hatchets, ſwords, and other edge utenſils, prepared for exportation, are generally ill-tempered, half-finiſhed, flawed or brittle; and the muſquets, which are ſold for ſeven or eight ſhillings a-piece to the exporter, ſo careleſly and unconſcientiouſly prepared, they cannot be uſed without imminent danger of mutilation; accordingly one hardly meets with a negro man upon the coaſt of Guinea, in the neighbourhood of the Britiſh ſettlements, who has not been wounded or maimed in ſome member by the burſting of the Engliſh fire-arms. The advantages of this traffic, carried on at the expence of character and humanity, will naturally ceaſe whenever thoſe Africans can be ſupplied more honeſtly by the traders of any other nation.

Genius in writing ſpontaneouſly aroſe, and though neglected by the great, flouriſhed under the culture of a public which had pretenſions to taſte, and piqued itſelf on encouraging literary merit.

Among the poets of this æra may be numbered John Philips, author of a didactic poem called Cyder, a performance of real merit, though the author lived and died in obſcurity: William Congreve, celebrated for his comedies, which are not ſo famous for ſtrength of character and power of humour, as for wit, elegance and regularity: Vanburgh, who wrote with more nature and fire, though with leſs art and preciſion: Steele, who in his comedies ſucceſsfully engrafted modern characters on the antient drama: Farquhar, who drew his pictures from fancy rather than from nature, and whoſe chief merit conſiſts in the agreeable pertneſs and vivacity of his dialogues: Addiſon, who was excelled by none in the character of an eſſayiſt, either for ſtyle or matter: Swift, whoſe muſe ſeems to have been mere miſanthropy. He was a Cynic rather than a poet; and his natural dryneſs and ſarcaſtic ſeverity would have been diſpleaſing, had not he qualified them by adopting the extravagant humour of Lucian and Rabelais: Prior, lively, familiar and amuſing: Rowe, ſolemn, florid, and declamatory: Dryden, elegant, nervous, and entertaining: Pope, the prince of Lyric poetry, unrivalled in ſatire, ethics, and poliſhed verſification: the agreeable Parnel; the wild, the witty, and the whimſical Garth: Gay, whoſe fables may vie with thoſe of Le Fontaine, in nature, humour, eaſe, and ſimplicity; and whoſe genius for paſtoral was truly original. Young long ſurvived a venerable monument of poetical talent. Thomſon, the poet of the Seaſons, diſplayed a luxuriancy of genius in deſcribing the beauties of nature. Akenſide and Armſtrong excelled in didactic poetry. Even the Epopœa did not diſdain an Engliſh dreſs, but appeared to advantage in the Leonidas of Glover, and the Epigoniad of Wilkie. The public acknowledged a conſiderable ſhare of dramatic merit in the tragedies of Young, Mallet, Home, and ſome other leſs diſtinguiſhed authors. Beſides theſe, great merit appeared in the detached performances of Johnſon, Maſon, Gray, the two Whiteheads, and the two Wartons, beſides a great number of other bards who have ſported in lyric poetry, and acquired the applauſe of their fellow citizens.

Dr. Atterbury and Dr. Clark diſtinguiſhed themſelves in divinity: and Newton ſhone unrivalled in philoſophy. John Locke, the great reſtorer of human reaſon, may be ſaid to have invented metaphyſics, as Newton invented phyſics. Berkley, afterwards biſhop of Cloyne, ſurpaſſed all his cotemporaries in ſubtlety of reaſoning and deduction.

Candidates for literary fame appeared even in the higher ſphere of life, embelliſhed by the nervous ſtile, ſuperior ſenſe, and extenſive erudition of a Corke; by the delicate taſte, the poliſhed muſe, and tender feelings of a Lyttleton. King ſhone unrivalled in Roman eloquence. Even the female ſex diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their taſte and ingenuity. Miſs Carter rivalled the celebrated Dacier in learning and critical knowledge; and Mrs. Lennox ſignalized herſelf by many ſucceſsful efforts of genius, both in poetry and proſe. The genius of Cervantes was transfuſed into the novels of Fielding, who painted the characters, and ridiculed the follies of life with equal ſtrength, humour, and propriety. The field of hiſtory and biography was cultivated by many writers of ability, among whom we diſtinguiſh the copious Guthrie, the circumſtantial Ralph, the laborious Carte, the learned and elegant Robertſon, the ingenious and penetrating Smollet, the comprehenſive and philoſophical Hume. Nor let us forget the merit conſpicuous in Campbell, remarkable for candour, intelligence, and preciſion. Johnſon, inferior to none in philoſophy, philology, poetry, and claſſical learning, ſtands foremoſt as an eſſayiſt, juſtly admired for the dignity, ſtrength, and variety of his ſtile, as well as for the agreeable manner in which he inveſtigates the human heart, tracing every intereſting emotion, and opening all the ſources of morality. The laudable aim of inliſting the paſſions on the ſide of virtue, was ſucceſsfully purſued by Richardſon, in his Pamela, Clariſſa, and Grandiſon; a ſpecies of writing equally new and extraordinary, where, mingled with much ſuperfluity and impertinence, we find a ſublime ſyſtem of ethics, and amazing knowledge, and command of human nature. Many of the Greek and Roman claſſics made their appearance in Engliſh tranſlations, which were favourably received as works of merit; among theſe we place Homer by Pope, Lucan by Rowe, Virgil by Dryden, and another tranſlation by Pitt and Warton, Horace by Francis, Polybius by Hampton, and Sophocles by Francklyn. The ſeveral wars introduced a variety of military treatiſes, chiefly tranſlated from the French language; and a free country like Great Britain, will always abound with political tracts and lucubrations. Every literary production of merit calculated for amuſement or inſtruction, that appeared in any country or language of Chriſtendom, was immediately imported, and naturalized among the Engliſh people. Never was the purſuit after knowledge ſo univerſal, literary merit more regarded, than in this æra by the body of the Britiſh nation; but it was honoured by no attention from the throne, and little indulgence did it reap from the liberality of particular patrons. The reign of queen Anne was propitious to the fortunes of Swift and Pope, who lived in all the happy pride of independence. Young, ſequeſtered from courts and preferment, poſſeſſed a moderate benefice in the country, employing his time in a conſcientious diſcharge of his eccleſiaſtical functions. Thomſon, with the moſt benevolent heart that ever warmed the human breaſt, maintained a perpetual war with the difficulties of a narrow fortune. He enjoyed a place in Chancery by the bounty of lord Talbot, of which he was diveſted by the ſucceeding chancellor. He afterwards enjoyed a ſmall penſion from Frederic, prince of Wales, which was withdrawn in the ſequel. About two years before his death he obtained a comfortable place; but he did not live to taſte the bleſſing of eaſy circumſtances, and died in debt.

None of the reſt, whom we have named, enjoyed any ſhare of the royal bounty, except W. Whitehead, who ſucceeded to the place of laureat at the death of Cibber; and ſome of them, whoſe merrit was the moſt univerſally acknowledged, remained expoſed to all the ſtorms of indigence, and all the ſtings of mortification.

While queen Caroline, conſort to George II. lived, ſome countenance was given to learning. She converſed with Newton and Clarke, and correſponded with Leibnitz. She took pains to acquire popularity: the royal family, on certain days, dined in public for the ſatisfaction of the people: the court was animated with a freedom of ſpirit and vivacity, which rendered it at once brilliant and agreeable. At her death that ſpirit began to languiſh; and a total ſtagnation of gaiety and good humour enſued. It was ſucceeded by a ſullen calm, an ungracious reſerve, and a ſtill rotation of inſipid forms, during the ſequel of her huſband's reign.

England was not defective in other arts that embelliſh and amuſe. Muſick became a faſhionable ſtudy, and its profeſſors generally careſſed by the public. An Italian opera was maintained at a great expence, and well ſupplied with foreign performers. Private concerts were inſtituted in every corner of the metropolis. The compoſitions of Handel were univerſally admired, and he himſelf lived in affluence. It muſt be owned at the ſame time, that Geminiani was neglected, though his genius commanded eſteem and veneration. Among the few natives of England who diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their talemts in this art, Purcell, Green, Howard, Howard, Arne, and Boyce, were the moſt remarkable.

The Britiſh ſoil, which had hitherto been barren in the article of painting, now produced ſome artiſts of extraordinary merit. Hogarth excelled all the world in exhibiting the ſcenes of ordinary life; in humorous hiſtorical deſigns. Hudſon, Reynolds, and Ramſay, diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their ſuperior merit in portraits; a branch that was ſucceſsfully cultivated by many other Engliſh painters. Wooton was famous for repreſenting live animals in general; Seymour for race horſes; Lambert, Wilſon, and the Smiths, for landſchape; and Scot for ſea pieces. Several ſpirited attempts were made on hiſtorical ſubjects; but little progreſs was made in the ſublime parts of painting. Eſſays of this kind were diſcouraged by a falſe taſte, founded upon a reprobation of Britiſh genius. The art of engraving was brought to perfection by Strange, and laudably practiſed by ſeveral other maſters; and great improvements were made in mezzotinto, miniature, and enamel. Many fair monuments of ſculpture or ſtatuary were raiſed by Ryſbrack, Roubilliac, and Wilton. Architecture, which had been cheriſhed by the elegant taſte of a Burlington, and a Wren, ſoon became a favourite ſtudy; and many magnificent edifices were reared in different parts of the kingdom. Ornaments were carved in wood, and moulded in ſtucco, with all the delicacy of execution; but a paſſion for novelty had introduced into gardening, building, and furniture, an abſurd taſte, equally void of beauty and convenience. Improvements in the liberal and uſeful arts, will doubtleſs be the conſequence of that encouragement given to merit by the Society inſtituted for theſe purpoſes, which we have mentioned on another occaſion. As for the Royal Society, it ſeems to have degenerated in its reſearches, and to have had very little ſhare for half a century at leaſt, in extending the influence of true philoſophy.
